There was in the Camp one Spendius, a sturdy fellow, and audacious, but a slave; that in the late war had fled from a Roman, whom he served, and therefore stood in fear, lest he should be delivered back to his Master: at whose hands he could expect no less, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raising such troubles as might serve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own restitution impossible, were his Master never so importunate. With Spendius there associated himself one Matho, an hot-headed man, that had been so forward in stirring up the tumult, as he could not choose but fear, lest his own death should be made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Countreimen the Africans; telling them, that they were in far worse condition, than either the Gauls, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any forrein mercenaries. For (saith he) *These our companions have no more to do, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone; but we that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall be called to another manner of accompt, when we are left alone; so that we shall have cause to wish that we had returned home beggers, rather then laden with the money, which (little though it be) shall break our backs. We are not ignorant, how tyrannically those our haughty masters of Carthage doe reign over us. They think it reasonable, that our lives and goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times been accustomed to take from us even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their sovereignty: what wilt thou now doe, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as freemen, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? To all do know, that it were a very shame for us, if having been as forward in every danger of war, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty, to require their due. This notwithstanding, ye may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soon as our fellows are gone: in regard of whom they are content to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let us therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and fear us: their hatred will shew it self when their fear is once past: unlesse we now take our time, and whilest we are the stronger, effeeble them so greatly, that their hatred shall not be able to do us wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, wherewithall they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither money nor friends. The best army that ever served them, wherof we are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawn, all Africa would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they send for help? The case it self is plain. But we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gelco, by incensing these Gauls and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoveth us to please our good Masters, by joyning with them against our fellows: yea by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgiveness, or not over cruelly to punish our faults committed. He is most worthily a wretched slave, that neither hath care to win his Masters love, nor the courage to attempt his own liberty.*

By such persuasions Matho wins the African Souldiers to his own purpose. They are not now so greedy of money, as of quarrell; which he hath seeketh will not misse to find. When Gelco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals, to some other more convenient time; they break into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more fuell to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Souldiers will hearken: if any other stand up to make a speech, a shower of stones, flying about his ears, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speak word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath been said already by those good (spoke-men) so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only Thron, thron.

Now

Now the rebellion begins to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his own peace, but pursue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gelco is not wanting to the good of his Country, but adventures himself upon their fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while he works with the severall Nations, putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so follen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seem: but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Gelco knows: he sees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tells them, That they may do well, if they stand in want of money, to seek it of their Captain Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treasure, that he had brought; yea upon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows begin to grow calme, by his fair language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can find; that so the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open war. Matho solicits all Africa, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to use persuasion: the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole country into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversity hath never been untold of her errors: and as she is ever assured to hear her own, so commonly with her own she undergoes those of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they took from them the one half of their corn; that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted upon their vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the people, that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only such as can bear Armes are ready to doe service in this great commotion; but the very women bring forth their jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for the maintenance of so just a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aid of three score and ten thousand Africans: and are moreover furnished with money, not only to satise the present appetite of their men; but sufficient to continue the war begun, though it should be of long endurance.

§. II.

Divers observations upon this war with the Mercenaries.

† I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are faine to use the help of Mercenaries.

Here let us rest a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subject, over which we travell. Behold a tyrannical City, persecuted by her own Mercenaries with a deadly war. It is a common thing, as being almost necessary, that a tyranny should be upheld by Mercenarie forces: it is common that Mercenaries should be false: and it is common that all war made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldom hear, that ever the ruine of a tyranny is procured or fought by those that were hired to maintain the power of it: and seldom or never do we read of any war that hath been prosecuted with such inexorable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call tyranny, is, A violent form of government, not respecting the good of the subject, but only the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say, that it is the unjust rule of one over many: for very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other, than a meer tyranny; though it were so, that they themselves were a great City, and a popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this form of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardless of his life and welfare; unlesse himself be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of love. The practice of tyranny, is not alwayes of a like extremity: for some Lords are more gentle than others, to their very slaves; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it self unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of severall men, it is commonly seen, that the taste of live etnels, drawn out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seek out bounds to prescribe unto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: but every one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hath enough: but (as Coverousness is never satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a stock, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviseth new tricks of robbery, and is not better pleased with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, & he knows it well: but he thinks by cruelty to change hatred into fear. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all whom he suspecteth in which course, if he suspect none unjustly, he may be said to deal craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any conspirator to stand in fear, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other security, than to disarm all his Subjects; to fortifie himself within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and State, to hire as many lusty Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his own Country: for if not every one, yet some, one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publick misery. This considered, he allures unto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most unhoneft that can be found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose only favour they are maintained. Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickedness, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward than he doth give, should be drawn to turn his sword against the Tyrant himself: they shall all be permitted to do as he doth; to rob, to ravish, to murder, and to satisfie their own appetites, in most outrageous manner: being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hateful to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what language I write; I must be fain to say, that these are not dreams: though some Englishman perhaps that were unacquainted with History, lighting upon this leaf, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyranny grows to stand in need of mercenary Souldiers, and how those mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured unto the Tyrant.

†. II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects is worse, than the tyranny of one man: and that a tyrannicall City must likewise use mercenary Souldiers.

Now concerning the tyranny wherewith a City or State oppresseth her subjects, so it may appear some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearfull of her life: the less need hath she therefore to secure her self by cruelty. A City is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the lesse to pluck from her Subjects. If war, or any other great occasion, drive her to necessity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary summes of money, the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous & hateful, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harm. And Julian reckons it, as the compellment of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her slaves, that whilst she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signs of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignity: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desirous of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that she should keep a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintain them in all villany, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must do: her own Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a City is scarce able to deserve the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appear, that the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heavy, as the burdens imposed by a cruell City. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the help of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was fain to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtians, that were to be brought upon the open stage? By common practice, and generally approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphysical abstraction of the universall from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore, (as I have said elsewhere) That it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to set down, but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him; all which failings; yet is there hope, that his successeur may prove better.

Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings: and many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which, becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawfull Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannicall City, have no such hope: their Mistressse is immortall, and will not slacken the reins, until they be pulled out of her hands, and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mightier Chariotter. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull of the future. New flies, and hungry ortes, fall upon the same fore, out of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly amongst them, attended by all his poor kindred and friends, who mean not to return home empty to their hives, without a good lading of wax and honey. These fly into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour, (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: but were this effected, what availeth it? The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successeur of this man, he is more loving than could be wished in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have been inward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civil war. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or, Of Recovery, against extorting Magistrates: yet we finde, that it served not wholly to restrain their provinciall Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthenome tributes;

tributes; they loved not to hear, that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens for having been ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: the government of Verres the Roman in Sicily, that is lively set out by Tullie, may serve to inform us, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation, as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might infer a more generall proposition; That a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyranny of a City is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Liv. Dec. 3. l. 1.

Sutable to the cruelty of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and again, sutable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousy of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African souldiers; in Africa it self they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick war, shift his Mercenaries out of their own countries; *Vt African Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior praeul ab domo futurus uterq; miles, velut mutui pignorum obligati stipendia faceret; ut the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africa, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subject unto Carthage, & carried into the field, not only by reward, but by duty. Yet seeing their duty was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.*

t. III.

The dangers growing from the use of mercenary Souldiers, and forraign Auxiliaries.

THE extreme danger, growing from the employment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are seditious, unfaithfull, disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all places and Countries, whereinto they are drawn; as being held by no other bond, than their own commodity. Yea, that which is most fearful among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States that have trusted them. Those mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italy when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan, who being entertained by Queen Joane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden, and forced her to put her self into the hands of the King of Aragon Like unto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaves, even with the very same army which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the son of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example unto posterity, in losing his whole estate by the treachery of such faithless Mercenaries, as his own father had been. For, having waged an army of Switzers, and committed his Dutchy, together with his person, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Liveries unto his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in using the help of forraign Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turks against his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by perswasion or force, set them again over the sea upon Asia side; which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soon after followed.

followed. Alexander the son of Cassander, sought aid of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdom, slue the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himself King of Macedon. Syracoon the Turke was called into Egypt by Samar the Soldan, against his opposit: but this Turke did settle himself so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his successor became Lord thereof, and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdom, in effect, can furnish us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Country; & Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland; but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two kingdoms.

Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the united Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late war. Indeed these Low-countries have many goodly & strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kind. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency; neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they have seldom been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: and the like necessity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the War: and therefore, could ill spare unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped wel. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercenary Souldiers. Many fruitless attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that brave Commander Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt, to his grief, in his retreat from Gravingham, when, in the very instant that required their service in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize under a shew of greediness, or at least, by meer covetousness, have ruined in one hour the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to prove this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; save that it is folly to conceal what all the world knows. He that would lay open the danger of forraign Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet, with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Country, made it his first work, to thrust by violence a galling yoke upon the peoples neck. Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whilst he was consulting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginary forrow for the poor Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeving the Town to be surprised, and won; the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the City, discharged against his own troups, informed him better what had hapned: shewing, that they were his own French who stood in need of pity. Then was his feigned passion changed into a very bitter anguish of mind; wherein, finding his breath, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon dieu, que veux-je faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affairs of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using Mercenary Souldiers, or the help of forraign Auxiliaries: This notwithstanding, they were obedient unto necessity, and sought help of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger, when the Queen of England refused to accept the Sovereignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continual war, when the heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too just & wife (though not engaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his own inheritance: then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence in the forces of these their Neighbour Countries. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receive, but well affected unto the cause that they took in hand: or, if any were cold in his devotion, unto the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custody of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessity of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with leadings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country of the same religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may such a Country be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like success. But these circumstances meet so seldom, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercenary and forraign auxiliary forces are no lesse dangerous, than the enemy against whom they are entertained.

†. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assurance to use the service of their own subjects in their wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyranny, which hindresth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

Here it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use service of other souldiers in their many great wars, but performed all by their own Citizens: for if it were their manner to arm their own subjects, how hapned it, that they feared no rebellion: if strangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearsed? The answer is, that their Armies were compounded usually of their own Citizens, and of the Latines in equal number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interested in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldom they did employ so many) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other help had been wanting; which served to keep in good order their subjects, that were always fewer in the army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinity were not a sufficient obligation, yet many privileges and immunities, which they enjoyed, made them assured unto the State of Rome: under which they lived almost at liberty, as being bound to little else, than to serve in war. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soever, seems troublesome to the neck that hath bin accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italy have taken occasion of several advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have bin reclaimed by war, the Authors of rebellion hath sharply bin punished, and the people by degrees have obtained such liberty, as made them esteem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common city of all Italy. Yea, in proceesse of time it was granted unto many Cities, and those far off removed, even to Parus in Cilicia, where St. Paul was born, that all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it self. This favour was conferred absolutely upon some, upon some, with restraint of giving voyce in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release unto their new subjects half of their tribute, which they had bin wont to pay to their former Lords, which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to fear a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, that when some, for their well-deserving, have had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome, they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with their own present estate. Wherefore it is no marvell, that Perellia, a City of the Brasians in Italy, chose rather to endure all extremity of war, than, upon any condition, to forsake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were unable to help these their subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithfull to the utmost. Such love purchased these mild Governours, without impairing their Majesty thereby. The sum of all is, they had, of their own, a strong army; they doubled it by adjoining thereto the Latines, and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of their own subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

unto their Lords, and consequently in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seem strange, that the practice of tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity, whatsoever. For it is lesse difficult, (whosoever think otherwise) and more safe, to keep the way of Justice and Honesty, than to turn aside from it; yet commonly our passions do lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuse, or, at least, wile, taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyranny it is not so: for as much as we can hardly desery the passion, that is of force to insinuate it self into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires have bred many Tyrants: yet so that these desires have seldom been hereditary, or long-lasting; but have ended commonly with the tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which means the government hath been reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle Arish. pol. l. 5. c. 12. holds, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise tyranny? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all con-
 20 curre, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtlesse, we must be fain to say, That Tyranny is, by it self, a vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt even by Nature, to command or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankinde, are common likewise unto brute beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Fear, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both unto Mankinde, and to all creatures that have sense, 30 for the shunning or repelling of harm, and seeking after that which is requisite: even so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civil form of Justice. All these in-bred qualities are good and useful. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkenness, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an improper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than unto brute beasts, are held lesse vile, and perhaps not without good reason: yet are the more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse
 40 by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more horrible, and punished more grievously, than that of which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble root, even the depraved Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath been an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or that nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and overloaded by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary cistern: per, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist: yet the defective dulnesse, that permitteeth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which meer necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas tyranny is more active, and pleaseth it self in the 50 excess, with a false colour of justice. Examples of stupidity, and unaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are every where to be found: for this quality troubles not it self in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Clandius, hiding himself in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend, or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also cruelty doth help to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & felix scelus, a fortunate mischief, as long as it can subsist, There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned unto those, that know how how to increase, or preserve humane nature: all honours, greatness, riches, dignities, Empires, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. Caesar and Alexander, have un-made and slain each of them; more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the error of Mans judgement in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeness, is none other than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the passions incident both to Man and Beast; no less than Perjury, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Phryxus 10 campers, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Diomysius, and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were assisted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Freeman and slaves.

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of parents over their children, is natural, and appointed by God himself; so that it is alwayes, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authority, which one Freeman can have over another. The rule of a King is no more, 20 nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole country: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater and more Masterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said, Have dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowle of the aire, and every living thing that moveth upon the earth: which also he continueth unto Noah and his children, saying, The fear of you (and the dread of you) shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowle of the aire, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea: into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give also an apti- 30 tude to use it. The execution of this power hath since extended it self, over a very great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to governe themselves, proves them, according to Aristotles doctrine, to be naturally slaves.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant to oppress men with bondage: unless the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a servant, whom he hath slain by correction, if the servant live a day or two, because he is his money: or else by the captivity of the Midianitish girls, which were made bond-slaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath been very ancient: for Noah laid this curse upon Canaan, that he should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-servants and maid-servants, which were none other than slaves. Christi- 40 an Religion is said to have abrogated this old kinde of servility: but surely they are deceived that think so. Saint Paul desired the liberty of Onesimus, whom he had won unto Christ: yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of request, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giveth unto servants: Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a servant care not for it, but if thou mayst be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured liberty unto many; not only in regard of piety, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear of being discovered by their slaves, unto the persecutors of religion. Mahomet likewise, by giving liberty to his followers, drew many unto his impiety: but whether he forbade it, as unlawfull, unto his sectators, 50 to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell, save that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it seems he did not. In England we had many bond-servants, untill the time of our last civill wars; and I think that the Laws concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great use and service, there are grown up a rabble of Rogues, Cur-purses, and other the like trades, slaves in Nature, though not in Law.

But whether this kinde of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well proved, that it is naturall. And certainly, we finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the elect & reprobate) the wisest excel the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason, we shall find, that nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of servile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries have subsisted long without the use of any servility; as also it is true, that some countries have not the use of any tame cattell. Indeed the affections which uphold civill rule, are (though more noble) not so simply needfull, unto the sustentation either of our kind, as are Lust and the like; or of every one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and servile dispositions have liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets, there may we more justly wonder, how the dangerous toyle of Sea-faring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are weary of their own more painfull condition. This may suffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted even by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the general custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we find no cause to marvel, how Tyranny hath been so rise in all ages, & practised, not only in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but ever by consent 20 of whole Cities and Estates: since other vices have likewise gotten head, and born a generall sway, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have used well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? in the government of wife and children, some are utterly careless, and corrupt all by their dull connivency: others, by masterly rigour, hold their own blood under condition of slavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: and to prefer the Weal publick above all respects whatsoever, is the Vertue justly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue many ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle as one of them; & deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, used in defence of a mans own Country. 30 But if we consider, that a love of the general good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fountain of all goodness: we shall find, that no morall vertue, how great soever, can by it self, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; such as David, Josaphat, and Josias were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soon be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can find a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversity, or of some regard of state; a procurer of a general peace and quiet, who not only useth his authority, but adds the travell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to do justice; by the vi- 40 gorous influence of whose Government, civility is infused, even into those places, that have been the dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throats; one that hath quite abolished a slavish Brehon Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chief commendations belonging unto some good princes, to appear lesse regardable: he, I say, that can find such a King, findeth an example, worthy to add unto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Under such a King it is likely, by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in Countries before unknown; that Civility and Religion shall be 50 propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happiness of his subjects, shall cause the Nations far off removed, to wish him their Souerain. I need not add hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodily exercises, do partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the unspeakable goodness, rather than the inaccessible majesty, with both of which himself is induced, as far as humane nature is capable) do also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Left any man should think me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I add hereunto, hereunto, that such a King is nevertheless a man, must dye, and may rise: yet wisdom and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodnets. The people that live under a pleasant yoke, are not only loving to their Sovereign Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, than of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over slaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, & slaves outrageous, for a time: but among spirits that have once yielded unto slavery, universally it is found true, that Homer saith, God bereave a man of half his virtue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Horn, Odyss. l. 17.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the use of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it self, as is this present business of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectually, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the war against the Mercenaries was diversly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable success. The bloody counsels of the Mercenaries; and their final destruction.

Being now to return unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus far digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seek their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiniers. Had they all been subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to subvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These, using the advantage of their present strength, besieged * Vtica and Hippagretta, Cities of great importance, as being seated upon the western Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of land, Hippagretta standing inwards upon the great Lake, Vtica further out upon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunis abandoned, which lay fity to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the country: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected perill, any man may conceive. But the business it self awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides; and therefore travelled their brains to the uttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs from their shoulders, who, sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came unto the very walls of their City. In this exigent, Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoever was needfull, as well to relieve a Town besieged, as to batter and assail any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Vtica, so suddenly, that the enemies as men surpris'd, forsook their Trenches, and by retired themselves unto a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome was, after any loss, to flee two or three whole dayes journey off presently entered the Town; to shew himself after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceived, that he knew not how to use a victory; they assailed their own camp, and with great slaughter, drove the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within Vtica; and got possession of all the force that Hanno had brought for the relief of the Town. This bad beginning Hanno followed with futable indiscretion: losing the benefit of many fair opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm land.

The

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their three anchor; sending to the field their great Captain Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seventy elephants. Amilcar had work enough to do, before he should be able to meet with the enemy upon equal ground. For, besides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to win the only bridge, by which the River Mato, or Bagradas, was passable unto these, that were to travell into the Continent. This River had not many fords, nor shole easie for a single man to get over: but upon them all was kept such guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it self, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a town, wherein to lye commodiously, intentive only to the custody thereof. But Amilcar had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas used to be sometimes cloyed with sand and gravel, that was driven in by certain customary winds, and could not be driven out again, by force of that slow river, till the wind failing, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made use; and taking his opportunity passed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his own Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius look about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deal with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their own Master in the Art of War, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this fear was soon changed into presumption; when more than fifteen thousand of their own society, were come from Vtica, and other ten thousand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Army was far greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their own judgement, the better men; upon which confidence, they resolv'd to charge him on all sides, and bear him down, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attend upon him, watching for some advantage, and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onset. Especially the y that followed him in the Rear, had a great mind to begin the fight; whereunto their promptness was such, as took from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way toward the Bridge, keeping himself on plain grounds, that were fittest for the service of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Army. Neither made he shew of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashness of his enemies to encrease, till it should break into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldness than good heed, they followed him so near, as would be little for their good, if he should turn unto them, he halted his march, even to such a pace, as made a shew little differing from plain flight. The Mercenaries presently fell upon his skirts; believing, that for fear of them he was ready to run away. But whilst they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heels of those that had the Rear, Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, so amaz'd with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this overthrow there were fix thousand of the Mercenaries slain, and about two thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Campe at Vtica, others to the town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he won the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled unto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The same of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many townes revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himself in this dangerous time. He sent about to Numidia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or never, to do their best for the recovery of their freedom; he perswaded Spendius, and Antaricus, that was a Captain of the Gauls, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keep the higher grounds, or at least, the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and he himself continued to press the Town of Hippagretta with an hard siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his business required, to take such ways as there were: for all the Country lay not level. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, and once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lying in a plain, surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their

Numidian

Numidian and African succours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar his personal worth did greatly benefit his Country. For Naravafus, a young gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion, serving to get the acquaintance and love of so brave a man, which he much desired: and therefore came unto Amilcar signifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all service. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend, promised unto him his own daughter in marriage, and so wan from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naravafus turned unto the Carthaginians side. With this help he gave battell unto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the victory was taken: for there were slain ten thousand of Spendius his fellows, and four thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius 10 himself with Antarius the Gauls, escaped to do more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many as were unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should never more bear arms against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharp revenge upon all that should break this Covenant.

This humanity was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Antarius, as tending to win from them the hearts of the Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that no man among them should dare to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safety whilst Carthage was able to do him hurt. They counterfeited letters of advertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company, 20 respective only of their private benefit, and careless of the general good, had a purpose to betray them all unto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needful to look well unto Gesco, and his companions, whom these traitors had a purpose to enlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity, and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a bait, wherewith to intrap them all at once together, as also telling them what a dangerous enemy Gesco would prove, if he might escape their hands. Whilst he is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come to the same purpose. Then steps forth Antarius, and speaks his mind plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea, the only way, for the common safety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desiring to make their own peace, it would 30 go hard with those that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life; than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course every one should be engaged in the present Action, as having none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally that such as would speak here against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Antarius was in great credit with the Souldiers, & could speak sundry languages, in such sort, that he was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gesco and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheless there were some, that for love of Gesco sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document 40 unto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented, but further ordained; that all Carthaginian prisoners, which they took, should be served in like sort: and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they observed ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need say no more, than that it was most execrable ferity. As for the counsell of using it, it was like unto the counsell of Achitophel; All Israel shall hear, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his own fellows, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the punishment of less offences, committeeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengefull spirits of those that have been wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their several crimes. A coward thinks all provision too little for his own security. If Phocas be a coward (said the Emperour Mauritine) then is he murderous. To be steadfast and sure, in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensive against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianity; and such a quality discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who other- 50 wise wife would have repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect even their gentleness, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like unto the errors of Princes and Governours, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment is awarded unto the lesse offence, and unto the greater, he that hath adventured to rob a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his own security.

Against these inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, used with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his old souldiers were 10 any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to invite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their villany with answerable vengeance, casting them unto wilde beasts to be devoured.

Untill this time Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himself apart from Amilcar, and done little as may seem, for that nothing is remembered of him since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the war grew to such extremity, as threatened utter ruine to the one or the other side; then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar; with whom he joy- 20 nered his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: such was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Utica and Hippagretta, that had stood allwayes firm to the Carthaginian party, did now revolt unto the enemy, murdering all the Souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The provisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Army, were lost in foul weather; and Carthage it self stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been used as the safest course, to send forth, in great Expeditions, two generals of one Army. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; persuading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will use the greater diligence. They have also joyned two chief Commanders in equal commission, upon this further consideration, the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themselves Tyrants over those Cities and States that have employed them. In this point the Venitians have been so circumspect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, & not their own in all the wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of two commanding in chief, serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: 40 but in managing the war it self, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In wars made near unto Rome it self, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honour (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one years service; it is no marvell, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindred by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one war; but each went whither his lot called him, to his own Province: unless one 50 business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times prevail with their joyned Generals: yet was this never so seldom, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the lesse able Captain, though of equal authority, hath willingly submitted himself to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Army, received great and most dangerous overthrowes, whereof in the second Punick war we shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their wars most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldom failed failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appear. Now of those ten Generals, which served the Athenians at the battell of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper been better, than the judgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicily: the one being so over-wary, and the other so hasty, as came to nought that they undertook: whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Country and Common-weal most remarkable service. For it is hard to find two great Captains of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often overslipped, as at other times many actions are unseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the prince of Conde was slain after the Battell of Farnac, (which Prince, together with the admiral Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Army) the Protestants did greatly bewail the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than a hinderance to their affairs. For so much did the valour of the one out-reach the advisednesse of the other, as whatsoever the Admirall intended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident in his own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: to who, though they were still sick of their ill grounded love to Hanno, and were unwilling to disgrace him, yet seeing that all ran towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controversies, unto the Army that served under them. The judgement of the Army was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affairs of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Army neer unto the City, and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much, having in their Campe above fifty thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Nevertheless, the City was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the wars in Sicily he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his own; because if no other State gave the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principality of Syracuse would soon be devoured by them. The Romans also gave them some slender assistance, and, for the present, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries. This they did to shew a kinde of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeite, as the sequell manifestly proved.

While Matho and his followers were busily pressing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that come to their supply: so that finding themselves more straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them; they purposed to desert from their vain attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captain assisting the rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naravusus, made Spendius fearful to descend into the Plains. Wherefore he betook himself to his former method of war, keeping the mountains, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew itself, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had moreskill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his own men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the overthrow in plain battell: untill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough to perceive their own disadvantage; and therefore they had the lesse stomach to fight:

fight; but a waiting for help from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them to dare impossibilities, used the benefit of their present fear, and shut them close up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably, for succour that came not: and having spent all their victuals, were lo pinched with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deserved any favour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be unmindfull of them. But when they were driven to such extremity, that they were faine to devour their own companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of relief: their obstinacy was broken, and they threatened their Captains with what they deserved, unless they would go forth to Amilcar, and seek such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarcas, and Autarim, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yield themselves, if it were so required, unto the death, rather then perish by the hands of their own Companions. Hereupon they sent to crave parlie, which is granted; and these three come forth to talk with Amilcar in person. What they could say unto him, it is hard to conjecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seems that they took the blame upon themselves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chooseth out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remain at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coat. When the peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, & so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded upon so gentle Articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to arms. But they wanted Captains to order them: and the same astonishment, that made them break the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of justice, in accomplishing revenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slain: being forty thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naravusus, and Hannibal, carryed the war from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yeeld: Utica and Hippagreta only standing out, upon fear of deserved vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to beggia with Tunis, wherein lay the chief strength of the enemy. Comming before this Town, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the wals; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedy victory had been assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay toward Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to help one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoved each to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the wals beheld his own destiny, in the misery of his companion; and knew not how to avoid it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal: and with so great and unexpected fury he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he took Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirty the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently revenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining after this great losse, to continue the siege; but was faine to break it up, and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terror was no less within Carthage, upon the fame of this losse, than had been the joy of the late great victory. All that could bear arms, were sent into the field, under Hanno; whom, it seems, they thought the most able of their Captains surviving the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them forbidding the employment of one sole Generall near unto their City (for they are known to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to devise about restoring it. But thirty principall men are chosen by the Senat, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's camp, and by all good persuasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed unto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheless after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar & Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this war lasted, Hanno took warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to use the reputation of his late success, whilst it gave some life unto his business. He had reason to do as he did: but he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of war, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so far abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one battail: wherein either his own desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no less prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved it self in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inviting their friends to help; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battail might have been foretold, without help of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having been often victorious; and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the desire of liberty should work so much, in men accustomed to servitude, as the honour of their State would, in citizens, whose future & present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians won a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, & therefore they all yielded; and Matho himself was taken alive. Immediately upon this victory, all the Africans; that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vtica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of favour. But they were soon forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victors. Matho and his followers were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be devised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this war. The war had lasted three years, and about four moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subjects did not love them, should wish less expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Islanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHILEST Matho and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africa, other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bolsar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Island to their own use. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Army (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the sudden. But these companies that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, & present profit, to joyn themselves with those that were already revolted; than to endanger themselves by battail, for the good of that common-weal, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels, offering to run one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore to take away all jealousie and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath been in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrell of an unjust war, to enjoyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawn, that desperate men can deliver to each other; to performe some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kinde of cruelty did the ungratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedemonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possesst himself of their City, by right of war, did not only spare the sack and spoil thereof, but gave them equal freedome, with the rest of the Cities united. These Revolts are also common in our Court wars; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Cesont les coups de vieille escrime. These (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Islanders were no lesse glad, than the soldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Country: but they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the soldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwise, the soldiers were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolved unto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) have risen between Spendius with his Mercenaries, & their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: unless the riches of Carthage had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Country; the matter was not easily taken up. So they fell to blowes, which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to save themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mantineans had called them into Stail. Yet this offer was refused, upon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with corn: of whom the Carthaginians took almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And upon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the City of Vtica, offering it self unto their subjection. This might have served, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meer regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the vertue of Amilcar: who, had he been overthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one main battail, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercelless villains, or have humbled her self under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessity, whereinto Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one sally made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choise. Wherefore it was not unwilfully done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking ship, to run her self aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africa, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced war against this enfeebled and impoverished City, under a shamelesse pretence; that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome it self. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alledge) of the great fear which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently sought occasion of war. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the money was payed, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: she felt hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

How the affairs of Carthage went between the African Rebellion, and the second Punick Warre.

THe injurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrell; served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson; That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place; and the best means were thought upon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousy of the Romans, forbade all attempts upon the Mediterranean Seas; but the riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve, both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repair their decayed forces, with all needfull supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and sovereign trust was committed unto Amilcar: upon whom his Country did wholly repose it self; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the generall love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: only they commended peace and quietnesse; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the straights of Hercules, (now called the straights of Gibraltar) and landed on the western coasts of Spain, in which Country, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally in a battell that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe along time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his son in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of war; but far better in practice and cunning than in deeds of armes. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding to many subjects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City, upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now * Carthago. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Ile of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a war of far lesse importance, (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to help this, at the present they know not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he request, request, since his request shall have the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mameritines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours, but in the enterprize of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affairs had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had been suspected) they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that howsoever the generality of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pills, to avoid all occasion of war with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more salubrious, and resenting the injury, return such answer, as would inangle his whole Country in the quarrell, that they to much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely devided their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would have this insolent covenant inserted into the Articles of peace; he took upon him to do it, of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for fear of present war, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans won some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be mistress over them, stood in fear her self, of receiving blows from a stouter Dame; there were soon found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entred into confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull unto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemy in war to the Carthaginians) into their society: and unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians, to use violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall find that the Romans could have none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not pass, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain in which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that River, held almost all the Country. Howsoever it were, this indignity was not so easily digested, as former injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries, or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right: war against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight years: (being slain by a slave, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, son of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

* The Spaniards have since built a City of the same name in the West Indies: which being peopled by them in the year 1532, was sacked by the English in the year 1585.

S. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reign of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long term of the first Punic war; and the vacation following, between it and the second, the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as the an after-spring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a form of liberty: in petty tyrannies (bred of those inferior Captains, which in the times of generall combustion, had seized each upon such towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; & some States were risen to such greatness, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels and great wars, about the Kingdome of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus the son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning six and thirty years; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath been already shewed, but by Alexander the son of Pyrrhus the Epirus, from whose father he had hardly won it. This hapned unto him, by the revolt of his souldiers, even at such time, as having overthrown with great slaughter an Army of the Gauls, he was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his young son Demetrius raised an Army, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinth, stood upon a steep rocky hill on the North side of the town, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Aegean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the main of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle was able to cut off all passage by land, from one half of Greece unto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious havens. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, and after his death, Gratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, untill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicaa thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The device was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicaa, and seek her marriage. The foolish old widow perceived not how unfit a match she was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of marriage; where to the old King was even as ready to consent, as was his son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plays, and all sorts of games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time; and got into the Castle, beguiling the poor Lady, whose jealousy had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not contain himself within the gravity becoming his old age. But as he had stolen it; so was it again stolen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his father, reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achaïans, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only son of Demetrius, was a young child when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his uncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince;

Prince, but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own son, to whom he left the Crown at his death; This Antigonus, was called the Tutor, in regard of his protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, Will-give, because he was slow in his liberality. He repressed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reign. Upon confidence of this good service, he took state upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutiny; but were soon appeased by fair words, and a seeming unwillingness of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaïans took from him the city of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not been endangered by a nearer enemy. But civil dissension, which had overthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most; overthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sickness; and gave to this Antigonus no lesse authority therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaïans from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Lawes, and by their clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of weights, measure, and money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heracidae, when Tisamenus the son of Orestes possessed the Territory of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Cyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall government of their Predecessors into Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equal. This form of Common-weal had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of times, till the reign of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battail of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a war, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or near it, Ptolemy the son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimai, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-union, which after followed. For having been, some of them Partisans with sundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amity, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimai, to whom also the Cities of Tiræa, and Phars, joyned themselves; Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entered with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacy. These Cities, for twenty and five years, used the same form of Government with the Achaïans; who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weal; and soon after by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynenus was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in exile, whilst his Country was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other banished men, to enter their own city by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaïan league: which though at that time it received more increase by their accession than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against against Antigonus, whose subtlety was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsell of Aratus delivered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaean league; so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controversies, between the banished Stygians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Evergetes King of Egypt, who partly had a desire to hold some strong & sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pieces, wherein the workmen of Syion excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadel of Corinth; which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by some thieves that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasury, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonus his souldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the place already, upon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kind of night-services, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open field, and plain battail, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began battail; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, & in a manner confined unto severall sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, use, good successe, and other help: yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Country he was unprovable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truly testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joynd unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Traxenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerful, that it adventured to take Athenes, from the Macedonians, & Argos & Megalopolis, from tyrants that held them. The enterprise upon the Athenians was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ranfome, to allure the City by shew of love; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now grown honest slaves to the Macedonians. Upon Argos the adventure was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the City, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedome; sundry times, and with diverse events, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose up one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battail; but all sufficed not: untill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired by Aratus, that he consented to resigne his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus, that had oppressed the Phliatians.

Whilest this business with the Argives was on foot, Lyfidas the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gave liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen Generall of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two years together by one man): every second year, for a certain while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lyfidas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the generall good; in which courtes they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appear in due time.

The

The Achaans having obtained so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land, made open War upon Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatas, for the liberty of Athenes. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battail, the Athenians wore Garlands, in sign of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was veified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter servit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in service, or insolent in command. Nevertheless when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by money, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaans, loving them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could do: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by justice and honesty; so did the Aetolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it self, wax very powerfull, by sturdiness of body, and rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antipater and Craterus, partly by daring to do and suffer much, partly by the natural strength and fastnesse of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captains to other business, as hath been related. They had molested Cassander, in favour of Antigonus, & were themselves as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a stout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the son of the first Antigonus, and more or lesse with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often war with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardned with perpetual travail; seldome putting off their Armour. But their hardnesse ill deserved the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship, measuring all things by their own insolent wils, and thinking all people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Aetolians had lately made great spoils in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Country. They had invaded the friends of the Achaans; taken and sacked Pallene; where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gain made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driven to seek help of the Achaans; which they obtained. The war which the Achaans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Aetolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diverted from home. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged; though very basely the Aetolians, giving thanks in words, devised how to requite the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achaans were desirous to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance & Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedamonians were very jealous. Wherefore these Aetolians laboured earnestly, to set the Lacedamonians and Achaans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called in to help (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus, offering to make him partaker of their gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that this Kingdom had sustained by the Achaans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedamonians cause to take Arms. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: & not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been meddling with the Lacedamonians to look about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaean.

The City of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Aetolians entring Laconia with an Army, had carryed away fifty thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of spirit, that had sometime been their general virtue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands all the rest were needy people, and delirious of innovation. Hercupon followed intestine sedition, which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reform the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lycurgus his laws. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal division of Lands. All the younger, and poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himself a dissolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends & Counsellors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their own private commodity. They were hasty to take away all debts, and cancell all bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the division of Lands they afterwards hindred, because their own possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foul oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuary, out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the lawes, using their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and served to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannical oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoin Lacedaemon to the Achaens Common-wealth: though it were great injustice to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it self, if it could have been wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also requite the unjust attempts of the Achaens, even in their own kinde: obtruding upon them by force an union of all Peloponnesus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedaemonians and their King, should have been the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be slain: took his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gave her in marriage (perforce) to his own son Cleomenes. This young prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himself to be King, whilst he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and fortifie Atheneum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title, he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegæa & Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedaemonians; wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful nights travel, & discovered his enmity to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing sorry. By these degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have stayed the quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lyfidas and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them: especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Aristomachus was at that time General of the Achaens, (He and Lyfidas being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyranny) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a journey to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serve, therefore therefore he came in person, and took part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present, and less in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himself against Aristomachus, who desired to give battail. Yet had the Achaens twenty thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedaemonians, & raised an ill report upon Aratus, which Lyfidas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Nevertheless the Achaens would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the year following; against Lyfidas his accuser that sued for the place. Being General himself, it behoved him to confute, with deeds, the slanderous words of Lyfidas. Therefore he purposed to set upon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, near unto the Mount Tycæus, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battail, and drave him to hide himself all night for fear, so that he was thought to have been slain. This misadventure Aratus recompered by a trick of his own more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been victorious. For whilst there wasno suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake, he suddenly wrought with some of the Man-tinæans, who did let him into their city. These Manthinæans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before joyned themselves with the Achaens; but shortly upon fear, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achaen society. As this good success repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battail almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered near unto Megalopolis; where the Achaens had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lyfidas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; & taking with him all the horse, brake upon the Lacedaemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slain by them and his followers driven back upon their own Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Army was disordered and put to flight. This was a great loss and incensed the Achaens against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the war nevertheless; wherein though Cleomenes wan some Towns, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achaens being weary, and the Spartan King intente upon another busines.

Cleomenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull journeys, forsook the Achaen war on a sudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he slew the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched upon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the City, he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of Mercenary help, as it lately had done, to save it self from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste, the Spartans well satisfied, and Cleomenes himself ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any advantage of these his domestick troubles.

The Achaens hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the City, for fear of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard that he had wasted all the Country of Megalopolis, had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure, and was admitted into Maninæa, and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to hear worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedaemonians refused their ancient courage; and he himself had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the possession of a few Towns: but adventured to win or lose all.

all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantineæ, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and saw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he advised how to provide against the worst, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to save all from utter ruine. The office of General, when it was next put upon him, he refused; fearing to be so far preft, as to hazard in one battail all the force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted to surprise, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, overcharged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the Weal-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of battail; that Mantineæ had not only opened her gates unto Cleomenes, but slain the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulsion; and that Arifomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since General of the Achaans, was now revolted unto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemy was too far of to help; and the nearness of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be usefull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his own profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpose; and instructed them how to deal both with Antigonus, and the Achaans.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some speciall benefits. At this time it lay nearest unto the danger; was very faithfull; and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achaans, with their own proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should be sent unto the Generall Council of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their necessity. This was granted, for lack of what else to answer; and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly, telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time borne unto him and his Predecessors, of their present need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more generall matters, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loss or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himself did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaans under the Patronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help should not be wanting, so far forth, as it might stand with the Achaans good liking. Particularly he commended himself by these Messengers to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himself highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a just and worthy love to his own Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: & are presently sent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Achaans were glad to hear, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desires; & therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent; and praised the wisdom of his Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amiss, first of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himself moderate, in that which himself of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustain the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amiss; since it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurely, the generall consent.

Nevertheless

Nevertheless, in true estimation, this fineness of Aratus might have been used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had bin more honourable to make an end of the war, by yielding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus: since thereby he should both have freed his country from all further trouble, and withall, should have restored unto the universal State of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found, (which is great pity) that Virtue, having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it self, (as it were) in the seat of principality, by length of time, and success of many actions, can ill endure the hasty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it self likely to be overtopped. Other cause to despise the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himself more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw his own honours reversed by the insolent Macedonians: and in stead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings; the posterity of Heracles, was fain to do sacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a god, and was finally poysoned by Philip, whose Nobility was but of five descents, and whom perhaps he might have seen his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolemy was lost: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality, as he had used to the Achaans; being warned, as may seem, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disburging. Cleomenes himself, whilst this business with Antigonus was a foot, passed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achaans to battell. At the City of Dymes in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them; where he had to great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamity was such, that Aratus himself durst not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaans were compelled to sue for peace, which was granted upon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate unto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in war. Hereunto if they would descend, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaans: who desired him to come to the City of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the War.

Now seemed the affairs of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had ever been since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or since the Persian invasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, and thereupon fell extreme sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheless he sent home the chief of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achaans in their desire of his friendship: who assembled again at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it, and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of resolving. When all would not serve turn, he betook himself to his cunning, and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hostages for safety of his person. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement; and took it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had been an easie matter, to have told him so much at the first, and not have made him come so far with an Army, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seems to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners, who sought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deal only with themselves and their Messengers, or if he would adventure himself into the City, then to deprive him of all Royall shew, that might breed respect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, & for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person; lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, should presently be won with his gentle words, and finish the bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks: and Aratus was not far behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all, as it were to fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their present weakness, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terror, he won Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this case Aratus sent his own sonne to Antigonus, intreating him to defer no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gave good words as could be wished: saying that he utterly refused to doe anything, unless he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the horse against his enemy the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himself to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to do it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found, for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himself out of their City, and sent word to Antigonus, that their Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ran to Cleomenes, who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to save it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilest this was doing, he took speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Town, should be kept for the Owner, to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus; promising, that if he would hearken to these persuasions, then would he give him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Prolemy. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured sovereignty of the Country; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be jointly kept by the Lacedemonians and Achaens. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus, rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own son as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seized upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Isthmus; having passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the straights of Thermopyla against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this journey. At his coming thither he found the Lacedemonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battell, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force: but he was not able so to doe: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity, newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his enemies. The Achaens were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbore to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly at the entreaty of friends, and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that the would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Achaens, assailed his Garrison, cur in pieces the rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood by continual messengers, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos were almost lost: he began to fear lest his labour in guarding the entry should grow frivolous; the Achaens in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could save, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his coming to Argos, that both Argives and Achaens were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets: when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered afar off, halting to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, then to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaens, to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behind with him; but made him Captain-Generall over them and their Confederates: and further entred into covenant with him, That they would not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his own Town, (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (soforth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes, that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achaens. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left unto himself at his earnest intreaty. It might therefore appear, that this God was also spitefull. Nevertheless in taking revenge upon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the aid of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Arifomachus to death, who had been once Tyrant of Argos: afterwards General of the Achaens, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Achaens. For he slew all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bond-slaves: dividing the spoyle, two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Town it self was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this business, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse, than even the flattery which Aratus was driven to use to Antigonus: so far as it was a token of servility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speak of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought in the Civil State of the Achaens; let us return unto this war against the Lacedemonians.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantineæ, Orchomenus, Heræa, & Telphusa: Mantineæ he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaens, with whom he wintered at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; & that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territory. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineæ, & to those other Towns that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Egyptian promised much, but would perform nothing, unless he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypt, yet the aid came not. For Ptolemy was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himself, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumitted all the Helotes, which were the Lacedæmonian slaves: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as having defended it self in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The town he wan: but after he was entred, all that were fit to bear Arms rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and goods to them again, if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great booty that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achaens at Ægium: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of his unlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achaens. When he had lain a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser than to be moved with their clamors and suffered them to see their villages burnt; to bid him resign his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfy their passions with foolish words: rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor 30 other strength unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was most fit for war, Antigonus gathered together all his troupes, meaning to requite these bravadoes of his enemy, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes, on the other side, laboured to keep the war from his own gates; and therefore entred upon the Country of Argos, where he made such havock, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended invasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was fain to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King, that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, drave a Garrison of his out of Oligythi; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending unto him in Corn, to borrow the keys. These were 40 light things; yet served to dishearten the Achaen side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; by setting up his rest, without any more delay, upon Sparta it self. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epirots, Bæotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achaens, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selafia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus, coming unto Selafia, found his enemy so strongly encamped, upon and between the hills of Eva and 50 Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blows, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in assailing their well defended Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other, Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eva. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaen foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foot, incamped in the straight valley between those hills, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the battail, he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Euclydas, his brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on horse, as a private young man, among the Achaens. Hee seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them; perswaded the Captains of the Achaen horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of 10 charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keep their places; untill they received a sign from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly than well advised, intreated some of his own Countrymen to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Illyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perswaded the men at Arms his Companions to do the like: the folly of Euclydas being manifest, who kept the top of the hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plain, where they might fight upon even termes. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was sore hurt, 20 yet he made good the place that he had gotten, untill the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, was like to have been surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawn himself with an extraordinary speed. In this battel ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta; where he had no desire to stay, finding only two hundred left, of six thousand Spartans that he had led unto this battail, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves unto 30 Antigonus; and promising to do all that should at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) and imbarqued himself for Egypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolemy Energetes, who undertook to restore him to his Kingdom, and (perhaps) meant no less, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the mean season, he had a pension allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemy died; and his son Ptolemy Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and base Men, unmindful of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes 40 was desirous to return into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seem to invite him; Ptolemy and his Minions, would neither give him aid; nor yet dared to dismis him (as he desired) to try his own friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakness of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they devised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was, that with thirty of his Countrymen, he undertook a desperate enterprise: breaking out of the prison, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebel and seek their liberty. In which attempt he slew some enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalf) he, and his Compani- 50 ons, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Upon his dead body Ptolemy was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had been sent thither as Hostages, together with the wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloody end, as now befell his owne Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the victory at Selafia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: where he to recover the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly intreated the Citizens, and left them to their own lawes and Government: tarrying there no longer than two or three dayes; after which he hastned out of Peloponnesus, and never returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an advertisement that he received out of Macedon, how the Illyrians over-ran, and destroyed the Country. Had these newes come a little sooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least, wife tarried a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdome of Lacedemon would have stood, and perhaps have extended it self over all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battell with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-straining his voyce; wherewith he brake a vein that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdom descended unto Philip the son of Demetrius, being then a boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemy Philopater, began to reign in Asia and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemy, though old enough to love Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy all the seventeen years of his reign. The unripe age of Philip & Antiochus, bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdomes, as is usuall in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans, upon which occasion, when it comes, we shal more seasonably speak of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Whilest things thus passed in Greece, and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spain, the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corficans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also war with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little pain. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Livy saith, a tumult than a war. So that by all these light exercises their valour was hardly kept from rust. How the got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, it hath been shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meet to be utterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia; a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making war for gain, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius, king of Macedon, to help the Mydionians his friends, that were besieged by the Aetolians; for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrians succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Aetolians contented about the booty: the old Prætor, or chief Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the victory, and the division of the spoyl to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and won the town: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretty strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in latter ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Aetolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus, That the old, and the new Prætor should be jointly intitled in the victory, and have equall authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived and landed ere any was aware of them, they fell upon the Aetolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victory, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own business, but stoutly sallied out of the town. Many of the Aetolians were slain, more were taken, their camp and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians took the spoyl, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophy, inscribing the names both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new officers at the same time) as the Aetolians had directed them by example.

regard of the money, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not uneasy to enrich himself by setting upon the lesse warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and drank so immoderately, that he fell into a Plurisie, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left unto Tenta his wife.

Tenta gave her people free liberty to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if she had been sole Mistress of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet and sent it into Greece; willing her Captains to make war where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell on the western coast of Peloponnesus, where they invaded the Eleens, and Messians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the City of Phenice, to take in victuals and other necessaries. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gaules, that having been Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrirentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed and sent to sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Town. The Gaules were soon grown acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice; which deserved none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in arms, and hastned to drive out these unwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Town, there came news into their Camp, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by land, under one Scerdilaidas, whom Queen Tenta had sent to help his fellowes. Upon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good that Town, and the straights adjoining, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one nor the other sped well in their businesse. For Scerdilaidas found means to joyn with his fellowes; and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the Town, and gave such an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them despair of saving their Countrey, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Achaans and Ætolians: craving their help, with very pitifull terms of intreaty. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to present battail unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home by letters from Tenta the Queen, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mind to put his forces to hazard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom their Town, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart with all their booty and slaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own country by land, sending their booty away by Sea.

At their coming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandment of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whiles they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Tenta, that she should abstain from doing such injuries. These Embassadors found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the town Issa, which her forces held straightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Piracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, That injury in publick she would do them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their subjects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publick, of those private wrongs that are born out by publick authority: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. These words the Queen took so impatiently, that no revenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slain: as if that had been the way to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the mean to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred sail, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more with requiring satisfaction: for this injury is of such nature, as must be requited with mortal war. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embassadors: the reason and ground whereof, seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of war and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should pass freely, and in safety, between enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this general Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State lay hold upon Embassadors sent by their enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawful to use violence to those Embassadors (thus employed to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, & subjects of an enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered it when they slew the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, which practice against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any law whatsoever. For whereas the true office of an Embassador residing, is the maintenance of amity; if it be not lawful for one Prince to practice against the life of another; much less may an Embassador do it without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no privilege at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassador Cornucanus.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an error, that hath undone many of all sorts, greater and less than the both before and since: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had the easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater than ten thousand men; and that nevertheless, it prevailed as much by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in arms; she would have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her self. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it self, and one part of it fell with a Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In b Corcyra the Illyrians landed, waited the Ille, and besieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achæans were called in to help; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: losing, besides others of less note, Marcus Cyprensis, the first Prætor of Achæa, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Corcyra, dismayed with this overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetrius Pharius, who took possession of it with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the mean season, Tenta was angry with her Captain land of the A- demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to try any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consul, of Demetrius his fear and discontent. Likely it was that such an occasion might greatly help to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consul failed thither; where he found the Town of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it self unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consul failed along the coast to c Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he used thenceforth as his counsellor and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus the other Consul, with the Land-Army, numbered at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged, but upon news of the Roman army they disperse themselves. From

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queen Tenta to forsake the coast, and to cover her self in Rison, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans hasten homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staid behind, and prosecute the war, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to beg peace; which she obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth never send any of her ships of war towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans sent Embassadors into divers parts of Greece, signifying their love to their country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good success upon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which it it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadors were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtship, but well meant by the vain Greeks; & therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the war between the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italy.

The Gauls that dwelt in Lombardy, were the next, against whom the Romans took Arms. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they took Rome and burnt it: though the issue of that war proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times their success was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrows they received; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce than well advised: lightly stirred up to war, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, less than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gave always careful heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and uncertain; by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were called wars, but tumults Gallici, tumults of the Gauls: and rightly. For they gave many alarms to Italy, and used to rise with great Armies; but after a few days march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow, they would rest ten or twelve days, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive war, had leisure to grow, by sitting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls never fell upon Italy with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was travelling in the same enterprise, or in either of the two former Punick wars: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious City. But it seems that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to use their times: & were therefore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punick War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to set upon the Gauls in their own Country: and that was three years before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Etruria, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battail, and slain L. Cæcilius, with the most of his Army. Mannius Curius the new Consul, sent Embassadors to them, to treat about ransom of prisoners. But these a There were divers nations of the Boji's in Pennonia, Illyria, Germany, in Bœrbon, in France, and in Aquitany; but these Boji were of French race, and dwelt at this time about mouth of the river Po.

Embassadours they flew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it to well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Country, and sent a colony of their own to inhabit it. This caused the Boji, another people of Gauls, to fear the like measure: who thereupon took arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battles; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted until the end of this Illyrian war.

It vexed the Gauls to see a Roman colony planted in their Country, who had been accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpinus (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though those they were nearer, like as they called Cisalpinus, or 10 by hither the Alpes, those who dwell between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disjunction had caused their loss, so their union might recompense it, with large amends. But the business was so foolishly carried; that the Cisalpinus and Transalpinus fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soon after, they were urged by a greater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree, which was ratified by the people: That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly those Gauls. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or 20 Griana it self, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joyed with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadful President extremely displeased the Boji, who being neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displacement. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchy of Milan, joined with the Boji, & upon a common purpose entertained the Gessates, nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Smithers in these times. The Gessates having received a great impress, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings Concolitanus and Aneroestus: who with the Boji and Insubrians, com- 30 posed an Army of fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed; that ever invaded the Roman Territory: to whom the Senogalli, that had been beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better believing in their prosperity and rising fortune. For fear of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milan: with the rest of their forces they entered into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Æmilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they employ one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane. 40

Being at this time greatly troubled with the consideration of this powerfull Army, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no less willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those days. With the Consuls they sent forth to the war four Legions of their own: every Legion consisting of five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirteen thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and 50 Hetrurians fifty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbri and Sarfinates, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twenty thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanni, other twenty thousand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the General Army of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all uncertain chances of warre, thirty thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, garrisoned in Rome it self, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Over and above

b Cenomanni are the people about Bergamo, on the North side of the river Po in Italy. There were also of these Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Country of Main.

above these great troops; in the Roll of the Laines, that was sent unto the Senate, there were numbered four thousand foot, and five thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seventy thousand foot, and sixteen thousand horse; in that of the Sappages, fifty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lucani sent a list of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Marfi, Marrusini, Ferentini, and the Vestini, of twenty thousand foot and four thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Scit, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand four hundred foot, and four hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campanians jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to bear arms, there were registered two hundred and fifty thousand foot; and of 10 horse three and twenty thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and about six thousand horse. Calling up the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their confederates, it amounted to seven hundred thousand foot, & seventy thousand horse. But the number is somewhat mis-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himself by the dead payes: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he falls short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great soever this muster was, it seems to have been like unto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himself and his subjects, he took a Roll of all persons able to bear arms, 20 within the Duchy, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certain it is, that the battels of Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large account. Yet were the Romans fain to arme their slaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Canna. Wherefore the marvell is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helms: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter preparations, the Gauls keep on their way: and entering into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence fails them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had mislead of them, came again fast after them, to arrest them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the same evening discovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of 30 apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem, that shewed no great fineness of wit, but such as well befitted those that had none other occupation than war; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they caused their foot to march away, but not far, leaving their horse in guard; to whom they gave order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat: as if they had not dared to abide battell. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls return, charge them, and kill six thousand upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, & defend themselves, till L. Æmilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Upon the coming of the Consul, the Gauls consult, whether they should give the Romans battell, or forbear. In which dispute, Aneroestus, one of their Kings, persuades them, rather to return into their own Countries; where, after they had disposed of the great spoils and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the war, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This 50 advice they all embrace; for, seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoils of their enemies, they thought it wisdom, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had been in sight. But as well in the wars of these later ages, as in former times, it hath ever been found extreme dangerous, to make a retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, do often turn head, yet in always going on from the pursuing enemy, they find, within a few miles, either straight, hedge, ditch, or place of disadvantage, which they are enforced to pass in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knows a Tappas and Messapians seem to be one Nation, who are also called Sacuntines, Peucetians, Apulians, and Calabrians. The Country is now Apulia, concerning the Northernmost part of the Calabria. b A people of the kingdom of Naples. c Pistun calls them a people of Italy. d A people of Campania, called to this day Ferentines. e Birth Land.

knowes it as well as the Captain, that he which forsakes the field, perceives and fears some advantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of those succours that reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and understanding. They that make the retreat, are always in fear to be abandoned; they that lead the way, fear to be engaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost; and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the retreat be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the year 1503, upon a retreat made by the Marques of Sal, doth testify no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gave the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot overtook, and defeated them utterly. During the wars between the Imperials and the French, Boiss and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a bravery would needs see the enemy, before they left the field. So was Stroff overthrown by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first write: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodge from before Landersley, by night, as many other the most advised Captains, (not finding themselves in case to give battell) have done. Je ne trouve point (saith the Marshall Montluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraite; j'en ai vu plus de dix en l'art de la guerre, et si difficile, à faire, qu'une bataille. I find nothing in the art of war so difficult as to make a safe retreat. A sure rule it is, that there is less honour to dislodge in the dark, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue gives this judgement of a dayes retreat, made in France, presently before the battell at Moncontour. For (saith he) staying upon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeed, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruin. And yet did that worthy Gentleman Count Lodovick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncontour with so great resolution, as he saved the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of which my self was an eye-witnesse, and was one of them that had cause to thank him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe advice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Emilius follows them as near as he can, without engaging himself, attending his advantage. In the mean while, C. Atilius the other Consull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gauls inclosed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear and Front: To sustain Emilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois; in the Front they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Aneroesus, with forty thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and ere long all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the year following this overthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Mantius. The Romans knew well how to use their victory: they gave not ten, twenty, or thirty years time to the Gauls, to repair their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boii; but by reason of the great rains that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second year, Furius and Flamininus invade the Milanois; and prevail very far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Nevertheless these Consuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resign their Office: because the Argives, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not only foretold little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flamininus, receiving letters of this revocation from the Senate, and being otherwise advertised of the contents, was not hasty to open them: but first gave battell unto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then perused the letters, and returning home obtained a triumph, for against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Country of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, & one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by a way of Delegacy, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himself and his fellow Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in proceesse of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being disposed; M. Claudius Marcellus, & Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that year. The Gauls about this time desired peace; & were like to have obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want work. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alps, and joyed with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present war, was at an end. So the Consuls hastened into their Province, where they besieged Acerra, a town not far from Novara (so far had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchy of Milan. To divert them from this siege, Britomarus (as down before Clasidium, a town in the same Tract, with a great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerra; and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans break up their siege, Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deal well enough with those at Clasidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him upon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their journey, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in numbers, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his own personal valour, that he rode our single before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no less daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wife in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slew and disarmed Britomarus, in the presence of both Armies: whereby his own men took such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman Generall slew the Generall of the enemies, with his own hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cassius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say; that the two Scipios, and divers of the Roman Captains, especially Cesar, were better men of war than any of these three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Opima Spolia, The Armour of a Generall slain by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps assisted so to do.

After this victory, Acerra was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soon after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpinis, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City it self, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territory possessed by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countreys, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlawes and Thieves. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twenty years, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure; that they closed up the Temple of Janus: which they never did before, (it standing always open, when they had any war) save once, in the reign of Numa; nor in long time after, untill the reign of Augustus. But this their present happiness was not to last long: a dangerous war, and perhaps the greatest that had ever been, was to come unto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

§. I.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the son of Amilcar, was about six and twenty years old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was elected, by the Army, as soon as Asdrubal was dead: & the election was ratified by the State of Carthage, where-with Hanno & his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barchas) that had command in chief, over the men of war. Which honour would perhaps have been lesse envied, by these domestically enemies, if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generally good will, as it was first purchased by the worthy deserts of Amilcar in saving his Country from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great revenues, so was it retained, by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to take the virtue of their enemies, that was unreprouable; nor to performe the like services unto the Common weal, had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of War, and cautious advice of not provoking the Romans. This they seasoned other-whiles with detraction, saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppress the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious, to bear ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himself. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no security to Carthage, were the never so quiet, and officious; unless the would yield to become their subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than untill the Romans could finde some good advantage, to renew the war: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their own state was in good case, the war should begin; than that in some unhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yield unto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon termes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his countermen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time devised of this business) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should find friends and assistance, even of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forraign wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to hear that he had set the war on foot, would nevertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his design. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege unto Saguntum, which might seem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignity of that Spanish Towns alliance with her half friends. So should he assay both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his own Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he nevertheless went fair and orderly to work: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Livie) to give some colour to his proceedings; as if he had not principally intended the war against Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by course of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore he entred upon the Territory of the Olusades; and having besieged Althaa (Livie calleth it Carteia) their chief City, he became, in a few dayes, Master not only thereof, but of all the other Towns of their Country. This Nation which he first undertook, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he rested his Army in new Carthage, or Carthagena, and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoils he had gotten in his late Conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the war against the Vaccæi: and without any great difficulty, wan first Salmanica, now called Salamanca; and after it, Abucala, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficulty. But in his return, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall judgement. For all such of the Vaccæi, as were able to bear armes, being made desperate, by the spoil of their country, with those of Salamanca, and of the Olusades, that had escaped in the late overthrow, joining themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Army of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisborne in Portugal. These four Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he never saw enemy, upon whom he durst not give charge; were thoroughly resolved, that his natural valour would at this time no less neglect the cold advice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to use it. But he that makes himself a body of Cryall, that all men may look through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition, makes himself (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wife men, though they have single hearts in all that is just & virtuous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others look into being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtle Carthaginian, when he served under Asdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Army, the most adventurous, but that which may bescem a Captain, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwayes become a Chief; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as have been found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of war knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himself from the River-side, as if fearfull to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude, from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should; thrust themselves in fury and disorder, into the swift stream, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear) the defenses on the contrary side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well near over, he turned back his Elephants to entertain them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kinde of Lance de Gay, sharp at both ends, which they held in the middle of the staffe; had such an advantage over the foot, that were in the River, under their strokes, clattered together, and unable to move or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they flue all those, (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassadours to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeed; onely because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Senate, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged. Hereupon some cry out, that War should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carryed it. So it was only concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spain, to view the state of their confederates: which were indeed none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended war against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they listed themselves, upon the report of these Embassadours; and this their gravity, in being not too rash at first, would serve to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius an Historian of sincerity less questionable, tells, that they found him at Carthage, &c. had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptory Embassage (as Livie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the covenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was sent upon none other pretence, than prevention of war.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should do as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and improve his help against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani, a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, & having many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among neighbours) of which, Hannibal himself had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first provoked him; ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but sat down with his whole power before their Town. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheless, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions, not only because the War, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quaitell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their own. Yet were they not hasty to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, until they had an Army in readines to be sent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himself over-strictly tyed up by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an unthankfull disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward the same of the Carthaginian war, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece; against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and seized upon some places, that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, he might have sped better. For the businessse with the Gauls, was ended; with Hannibal, notwithstanding begun, when he declared himself, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Emilius, was sent against him: who in seven dayes was the strong town of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terror upon the Country round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further pains. Only the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which he might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too foolish. Emilius landed a great part of his Army, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in covert, presenting himself the next morning, with twenty ships before the town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul, and was soon intercluded from the town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creek, where he had shipping ready ready for him, and imbarqued himself: leaving all his estate unto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This businessse, though it wer soon dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal sat down, ere Emilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lye many dayes unable to move. Nevertheless he was not unmindfull of his work in the mean while; but gave order to raise certain movable Towers, that might equal those which were built upon the wals of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall, whereat an hot assault was given: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which upon the first fury they had won; but they were pursued even to their own trenches and camp. Nevertheless the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men, did so weary the Townsmen with continual travail, that at length it got within the wals; and was only hindered from taking full possession of the City, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himself out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered were so severe, and without all compass of honour, as Alcon durst not return to propound them to his Countrymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, silver, plate, and other riches within the City: yea, the City it self to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assign some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustain themselves, than the clothes on their backs or other armes, to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they far better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and saved the honour of their wives and daughters) then to have rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soon after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were desoured before their own faces; and all put to sword, that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort, which a great number of them took; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying unrevenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Army: the slaves, and other booty, he divided among his Souldiers, reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slowness, in forbearing to send help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, but in vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their honour, by taking sharp revenge. To this end they sent Embassadours again to Carthage: demanding only, Whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it seemed they would) thento give them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their second Embassage, howsoever qualified with milde words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the generall of our Army in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, have only followed his own counsaill; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske us. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is, Whether it were lawfull or unlawfull for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults & errors; to you, to challenge us, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lucius the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name, it is you that have taught us how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Lustatius, to your own disadvantage, you cast it upon your Consuls presumption as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and people of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disavow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punishment and precise warrant, the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargains, which Asdrubal hath made for us, 10 without our commandment and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meer cavill. For Lustatius the Consul, in his Treaty of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better, to have dealt plainly; and to have alledged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelve hundred talents: which perjury the State of Carthage, being now grown able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacy, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treaty of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treaty with Asdrubal, and all other business between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoever we require, else will we make War, without regard of our oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Livie himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge: we may reasonably think, that the mention of this injury was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the war, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embassadors, to deliver unto them in plain termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skirt of his gown, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cried out at once, Even which of them you your self have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and 40 share it among you. Which the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make War, it was merely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, have ever been maintained by the party unwilling, or unable to sustain the War. The rusty sword, and the empty purse, do always plead performance of covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (seeing peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best advised have rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonsis with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surpris as many places as he could, ere the war brake out; Don John with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spain, with the English, when in the great Imbargo he took all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spain, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to work them all possible mischief, as soon as he

he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvel, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soon as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain, and Africk. His journey into Italy.

WARRE being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved not to put up his sword which he had drawn against the Saguntines, untill he had therewith opened his passage unto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punick War; second to none, that ever the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthageena, where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the mean while he gave instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the government of Spain in his absence. He also took order, 20 to send a great many troupes of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the number of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain; to the end, that so the one Nation might remain as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteen thousand; eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares. Besides these he selected four thousand foot, all 30 young men, and of quality, out of the best Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it self, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serve for hostages: for among those four thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their severall States, had their Sons or Kinsmen. He also 30 left with his brother, to guard the coasts and Ports, fifty and seven Gallies; whereof thirty seven were presently armed, and appointed for the war. Of Africans and other Nations, strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spain and Africk; he sent discoverers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any War in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and Discoverers being returned with good satisfaction, in the beginning of the Spring, he past over the River of Iberus, with an Army consisting of four score and tenthousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spain, into which he had not entred before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who sat still at Carthage) to govern Spain on the East side of the 40 river; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spain, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also do, or attempt, he courteously dismissed any more that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journey seemed the lesse tedious unto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand foot, and 50 nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenes, and entred into Gaul. He found the Gauls that bordered upon Spain, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Country: but won them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the bank of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the River, a people called Volca. These were unacquainted with the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keep him from passing over the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vivaretz and Lymnois. For although many of them had transported themselves & their goods, into the Country of Dauphine thinking thinking to defend the further bank against him: yet such as remained, being very desirous to free their country of so many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Countrymen well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their own store of corn and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boats; informed him of another more easie passage, higher up the River: & lent him guides. When the Vessels for transportation of his Army were in readinesse; he sent Hanno, the son of Bomilcar, up the River: himself in the mean while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was: that Hanno charging the Gaules unawares upon their own side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further bank was won, though with some difficulty; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants; who marvellously feared the water. He was therefore driven to make rasses of trees, and cover them with earth and Turfe; whereof he fastned one to each bank, that might serve as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose upon which the beasts were towed over.

Having past this first burnt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of those that defend it, he was visited by the Princes of the Cisalpine Gaules, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himself extremely incumbered by the Savoyans; and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countreys on the other side. And whereas his journey over the Mountains cost him fifteen dayes travail, he was every day, more or less, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall extremely beaten with grievous weather and snow: it being the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this passage. But the fair and fertile Plains, which were now ready to receive them, with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory: gave them great comfort and encouragement to go on: having nothing else of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to overcome, by their proper valour and resolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and resistance.

s. III.

How the Romans in vain solicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THE Countries of Spain and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus far, had been solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the war at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, took Spain in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Voleians, a people in Spain; from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this uncomfortable answer: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans persuade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wife than so; For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, have been utterly rooted out, & destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spain have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us, That for our parts (and so I think, I may answer for the rest of our Country-men) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands; who are resolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Voleians, the Embassadors took their way towards the Gaules; using their best arguments to persuade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to pass into Italy, through their Territory: and withall greatly glorifying themselves, themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laugh't them to scorn, and had hardly the patience, to hear them speak. For shall we (saide one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibal's passage into Italy, entertain a war which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the war among our selves, and in our own Territory; by force which marcheth with a speedy pace from us, toward our ancient enemies? Have the Romans deserved so well of us, and the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our own houses, to save theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance: and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who have no way as yet offended us, nor we them.

With this displeasing answer the Embassadors returned home: carrying no good news, of friends likely to help them; but rather some assurance from the people of Maffilia, which were confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gave hasty proof. For when the news was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre up the Boji, and Isu-brians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it seems they could not win; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flee to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed weary, and seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their Hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their will. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prator, who lay in these quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the relief of the besieged. But the Gaules, having laid a strong ambush in a wood joyning to the way, fell upon the Prator so opportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running, a little village, but defensible; upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prators, was hastily sent, to relieve the besieged, with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Army, and supplied by a new levy.

As the Gaules were too rash and hasty; so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war. They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost servilely endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace, would be so brave and courageous on the sudden; as to attempt the conquest of Italy itself. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls to make warre in Spain, the other in Africk: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way toward Africk, with an hundred and sixty Quinquagemes, or Gallies of five to ten oare, which preparation may seem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and used such diligence, having the winde also favourable, as in five dayes he recovered Maffilia. There he was advertised, of Hannibal's his having passed the River of Rhodanus, whom he thought to have found busie yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had all newes of the Consuls arrivall: whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry, as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having slain only two hundred, and lost of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before, and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to look upon the wals of Rome.

This

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spain. Nevertheless he sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his fleet and Army, to try what might be done against Asdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in the Country. He himself, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troops of Manlius & Attilius that lately had been beaten by the Gauls: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travail of his painful journey.

§. IV.

Scipio the Roman Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battell at Trebia.

FIVE Moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious journey from Carthage; what great muster he could make, when he had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have been only twenty thousand foot, and six hundred horse. Hannibal himself in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have increased his Army, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, & eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembered by himself in the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished by diseases, enemies, Rivers, and Mountains, which mischiefs had devoured, each their several shares.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Army in the County of Premont; he sought to win the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held war at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amity. Wherefore he assaulted their Town; and wan it by force in three daies. Their spoil served well to hearten his Army; and their calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell unto his side: many for fear, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ran through the whole Country: which joyned, or was all in readines to joyn with the Carthaginians; when the news of Scipio the Consul his arrivall, made some to be more advised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had been heard of his approach: many late still for very fear, who else would fain have concluded a League with these new-come friends, and some, for greater fear, offered their service against the Carthaginians, whom nevertheless they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals hasten to the tryall of a battall. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondered at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange that the Consul, whom he had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himself in the Plains; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountains, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's success, and sudden arrivall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste unto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to understand hereof: & letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the war in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should return the Army under his charge, with all possible speed, to save Italy it self. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybaum; with direction to land the Army at Arminum, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: quite another way from Corstuge, whither he was making haste. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so near, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon both of them prepared the mindes of their Soldiers, by the best arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed upon certain prisoners prisoners of the Savians, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having been no less miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be delivered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slain, with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftains of the Gauls were wont to use in single combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his own lot might speed; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poor creatures were willing upon whatsoever uneven termes, to ridde themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but even him also, who being slain in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their own condition, speaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their own estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetuall slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himself any hope of life by flight; since the Mountains, the Rivers, the great distance from their own Countries, and the pursuit of merciless Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their own cause: seeing that there was never any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, he told them that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own soil, and in view of their own Towns, who knew as many ways to save themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertain such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seems impossible) did no way press them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no mean between victory and death, encourage his Companions. For, (saith a great Captain of France) La commodité de la retraite avance la fuite, La commodité of a retreat, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Ticinus, did not neglect to use the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in mind of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late war they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustain the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (saith he) yee your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after so many travails and mileries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roon, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himself, fearing our approach, ran head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, then by the sharp swords of the Romans, which had so often cut down his people, people, both in Africa, and in Scil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the grofs of his Army, with his Horse, and the Roman having also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other, Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gauls, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their troupes, to assist them: himself with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to try the metall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously, & were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart, for fear 10 of being troden down by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding the Gauls maintained the fight and did more hurt than they received, as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consul unmindfull to relieve them: their hardiness deserving his aid; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he adventured himself so far, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been left in the place, if his son (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilst the Romans were buied in helping their Consul, an unexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give upon the Romans in 20 flank, and to compals them about, whilst he with his men at Armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ran away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose looks were fastned upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all betook them to their speed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Army thereby greatly discouraged, he thought it a point of wisdom, having lost so many of his Fleet upon the first puffe of the winde, to take Post with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest overtook him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like 30 to prove. Therefore his battail of foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner stole the reitrait; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left six hundred of his Rear behinde him: who were the last that should have passed, and staid to break the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of war, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tutum miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be understood in this sort: If a Generall of an Army, by some unprosperous beginnings doubts the success; or finde his Army fearfull or wavering, it is more profitable to seale a safe reitrait, than to abide the uncertain event of battail.

It was two dayes after, ere Hannibal could pass the River, Scipio the whilst refreshing 40 his men, and easing himself of his wound in Placentia. But as soon as Hannibal presented his Army before the Town, offering battail to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Camp, the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftains and Souldiers, than Anserius, Briomarus, and Gessates, were come to help them: if they had the hearts to help themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell upon the Roman Camp, wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and presented their service. Hannibal received them exceeding courteously, and dismiss them to their own places: as men likely to be of 50 more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other service at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consul stole a reitrait, as he had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, sent the Numidians after him: following himself with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoil, had not staid to ransack their camp: and thereby given time to all, save some few in Rear, that were slain or taken, to pass the River of Trebia, and save themselves.

being both unable to travell by reason of his wound, and withall, finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consul, incamps himself strongly upon the banks of Trebia. Necessity required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Boji, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeem their own hostages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens & pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceived better hope of recovering their own men and lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, 10 attended the taking of Clasidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force, a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a desire of hasty revenge, than any great sorrow for their loss received; seeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire: They therefore hastened away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Army, by him sent out of Scil, awaited his coming. He therefore hastened thither, and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls devised 20 about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal's arrivall; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affairs in those parts, sought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himself the sole glory of the victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He also feared the election of the new Consuls: his own time being well-near expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; objecting the unskilfulness of the new-come souldiers: and withall, gave him 30 good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally unconstant, were upon termes of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians: those of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and loss of time. For the strength of his Army, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own home, had many passions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, 40 the Gauls, inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessities, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his own Carver; and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fled to the Romans for help; and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them; because they refused to joyn with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falsehood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injury: 50 and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore he sent out a thousand horse: which coming unlooked for upon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavy laden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest even into their own camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians sally out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his own men; and repelled the enemies, Hannibal did the like. So that at length all the Roman Army was drawn forth; and a battell ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victory (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in generall desirous desirous to try the main chance in open field: All the persuasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gauls, his spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himself how to help forward the victory by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a water-course, over-grown with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their camp, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent over Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse, to brave the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Scampronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his Camp, but forded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arms-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and cool their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latinis: having of the one sixteen, of the other twenty thousand. The mass of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse, thrusting their light-armed, & Darters, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse they had by far the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their foot were charged both in front and flank, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush; then fell the Romans, by heaps, under the enemies swords: & being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the horsemen that pursued him, there escaped no more of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Scampronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompensed with the loss that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champain, being by far inferior in horse, and withal, thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or un-even grounds and wood-lands, would have bin of no use. His second error was, that he made no discovery of the place upon which he fought, whereby he was grossly over-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his footmen with empty stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frosty day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perillous, than to present an army tyred with travel, to an enemy fresh and fed, since where the strength of body faileth, the generosity of minde is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got there-with into Placentia, stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showres, or would not perceive him, because they were over wearied. Scampronius escaped with extreme danger, flying through the Country that was over-run by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could have made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

S. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain, and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymene.

THE Winter growing on apace, was very sharp, and unfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans, who, being not able to keep the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet; but vexed them with continual Alarms: assailed divers places, and taking some, beating the Gauls their adherents, and winning the Ligurians to his party, who presented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, or

Treasurers,

Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in straight places, laden with irons, and miserably fed: those of their followers he not only well intreated, but sent them to their Countries without ranisme; with this protestation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his party and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in fear, lest he should make their Country the seat of War, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding upon them, and wasting their territory. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were ready soon after to practice against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to use Perwigs of hair, and false beards of divers colours; to the end that he might not be descryed, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Fain he would have passed the Appenines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had seen more swallows than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddie companions, & bring the war neerer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, having his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls, more serviceable friends abroad, than in their own Countrie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all ways fowle, than to any intolerable difficultie in that journey. Nevertheless, to avoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travell through the fens and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogs, he lost all his Elephants, save one, together with the use of one of his eyes; by the moistnes of the air, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deep mire and water. In brief, after he had with much adoe recovered the firme and fertile Plainnes; he lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this year: Servilius a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be served so again, unless he quickly finished the war. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entered into his Office, lest his adversaries, by faining some religious impediment, should detain him within the City, or find other busines for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunctions, and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fiery disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Army. All the Countrey between Fesula and Arretium he put to fire and sword, even under the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stir, that would not have sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captain of France hath said; Pays gaste n'est pas perdu; A wasted Countrey is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Country, Flaminius thought his own honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear: saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians were burning down all Italy before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he took horse, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensign-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jest; saying, that the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded that it should be digged up, if fear had made the hands too weak to life it: asking withall, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of his their jealousy, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territory of Cortona, as far as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire; 10 which whilest the Consul thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal so unadvisedly, that he fell with his whole Army into an ambush cunningly laid for him, between the Mountains of Cortona and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all sides, (save only where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turn, or make resistance. So was he slain in the place, accompanied with fifteen thousand dead carcases of his Countrymen. About six thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, took courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountains. If these had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might 20 have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their fear, which, kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardiness, was well asswaged, when they ceased to despair of saving their lives by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweat, upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noise, but not any way discovering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noon the ayre was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellows. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone ere they were destroyed and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought upon sooner, since they had no minde to return unto the fight. For destroyed they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who 30 over-took them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendring up their armes, upon his promise of their lives and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirm; saying, That it was made by Maharbal without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his own honour) what it was to keep no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their own. For if it were lawfull unto the Romans, to alter covenants, or adde unto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the 40 good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal be as a Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousness gaineth no more in prosperity, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fifteen thousand Italian prisoners, or therabouts, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he set free without rancome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyranny; that he had undertaken this war. But the Romans he kept in straight prison, and in fetters, making them learn to eat hard meat. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italy, if not a love of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the generall safety, but only the preserving of her own neck from 50 the yoke of slavery, which her over-strong enemies would thrust upon her in revenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battels. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battell of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with four thousand Roman horse, drew near unto the Camp of Hannibal. He was sent from Ariminum by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but, coming too late, he increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost half of them, drave the rest unto an high piece of ground, whence they came down, and simply yielded to mercy the next day. Servilius himself was in the mean while skirmishing with the Gauls; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him of his Colleagues overthrow and death in Beiturrus; that made him hasten back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular jealousy, which persuaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly 10 endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certain it is; that all men are far better taught by their own errors; than by the examples of their foregoers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had been taken up but the year before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered he himself to be caught soon after in the same manner. He had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battell, without help of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with shame and losse; else would he not, contrary to all good advice, have been so hasty to fight, before the arrival of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have 20 taken his companion with him the second time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his government of France ten years, Cæsar brought that mighty Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the German 30 ians, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there been every year a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if ever, have been subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to inform it self, within one years compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to prosecute a War to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence by reason of the shortness of that their time, many of them have returned as wise as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they 40 began but to know the first rudiments of War, and government, fitting the Country, they have bin called home, & new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever been the course of the World rather to follow old errors than to examine them: and of Princes and Governours to uphold their slothfull ignorance, by the old examples and policy of other ages and people; though neither likeness of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have persuaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingering 50 War. Minutius the Master of the Horse honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting; adventures rashly upon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Army, but rescued by Fabius.

Greatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill success, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than ever did war since 10 Rome it self was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow, that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and again, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could work wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded upon hate: he 20 only sought honour, and fought (as it were) upon a bravery: demeaning himself like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name, against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his ability, which to withstand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of use, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject unto controll of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but upon some extremity, and for no longer time than six moneths. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood upon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time the 30 one one Consul being dead, and the other too far off, the People took upon them, as having supreme authority, to give the Dignity by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of war in the City. Novum sacrum novum consilium expetit. Contrary winds, contrary counsels. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse; which officer was customarily as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

Liv. lib. 2.

The first act of Fabius was the reformation of somewhat amiss in matter of Religion; a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion been also good. But if it were true (as Livy reports it) that the Books of Sibyl were consulted, and gave direction in this business of devotion; then must we believe, that those books of Sibyl, preferred in Rome, were dictated by an evil spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this war to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before: also that great plays should be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumpery. This vehemency of superstition, proceeds always from vehemency of fear. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons return alive from Thrasymene, may serve to bear witness though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The walls and towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges upon Rivers were broken down; and all care taken for defence of Rome it self. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking up all the ships about Rome and Ostia to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions he had levied in haste: and from Ariminum he received the Army which Servilius the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forthwith he followed apace after Hannibal, not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he always lodged himself on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the mean while, pursuing his victory, had ranged over all the Country, and used all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to bear arms. Passing by Spoletum and Ancora, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and over-travelled Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches for Carthage; presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Having refreshed his army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasterns in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdom of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City: only he had assailed Spoletum, a Colony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gave it over. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent in a great siege. This the Protestant Army found true at Poictiers, a little before the battel of Moncontour; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Jean d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himself in any such enterprise, as should detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battell, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences between souldiers bred up, ever since they were Boyes, in war and in blood, trained & hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other keen the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so near, as he kept him from stragling too far; and preserved the country from utter spoil. He injured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees, and he brought them first to look on the Lyon afar off; that in the end he might sit on his tail.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardize and fear. But all it redred not this well advised Commander. For wise men are no more moved with such noise, than with wind bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indirection and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it wasteth it self sooner by surrerance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battell: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to cross the Appennines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battell: but being far too weak in horse, he always kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though afar off, he resolved to rest his Army, that was laden with spoil, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this can be done he must passe along by the Dictators camp, that hung over his head upon the hills of Cellicula, and Cassinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goonly garden-country, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meer error of his guide, that he first entered within these straights. For he would have been directed unto Cassinum, whence he might both assay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near it to prevent him. But his guide misunderstood the Carthaginian pronuntiation, and conducted him awry another way, from Cassinum to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himself, by a sleight invention, yet serving the turn as well as a better. In driving the country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose hornes he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the dark night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be a work of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell, but thought it a device to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill tops were horribly affraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs; and fell among the light armed Carthaginians, that were no less afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army, recovered sure ground without molestation: where he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner, keeping still on high grounds, between him & the City, whilst the Carthaginian wasted all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barnes and Store houses for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion; and left the Army in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his own sufficiency. He was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plain field would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtilty and ambush, which he thought himself wise enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthynesse to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; and the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at home bearing office in Rome, were enough to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, took he the matter never so haudnously. Hannibal on the other side was no less glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore he drew near, & to provoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Army to waste the Country. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamp'd hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutius, by plain force, won it from them the next day, and intrenching himself thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The main business of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chief of his strength; that he might keep them in good heart against the next summer: if besides this he could give 10 the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his own men, terrifie his enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Country at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginians sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and setting it in order, presented battail to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed over all the fields, and loaden with booty, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worse did it 20 anger him, when the Romans took heart to assail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer weakness, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despoile his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the business, Asdrubal came from Geryon with four thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldned Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom nevertheless he did not such hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Army, and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Army had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own camp; and that in so doing, it came off 30 with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the Horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: loving that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearfull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his own place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to do so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly. That good success issuing from bad counsell was more to be feared, than calamity; for as much as the one bred a foolish 40 confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Against these sermons every one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which office warranted him to speak, and do what he list, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Town, in our greatest necessity, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italy to be wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unless he also hinder others, from doing better than himself can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while, Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and he, have as it were taken Truce, Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forbore to spoil some grounds of 50 Fabius, that so he might bring him into envy and suspicion) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the war to last long, that he himself might be long in office, and have the sole Government both of our City and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, should again take it from him and conferre it upon one more worthy. But lest, in moving the people hereto, I should seem to doe him injury; thus far forth I will regard his honour: I will only only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious; as to think that his generall intent, and care of the Weal publike, was less than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand up, and formally deliver his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both unto a worthy Personage, and 10 (therewithall) unto that dignity; whose great power had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Praetor, was glad of such an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the son of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew by often brabbling; to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office, and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very baseness. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot invective, not only against Fabius, but against all the 20 Nobility, saying, That it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they sought to humble the Commons by poverty, and to impoverish them by Warre; especially by war at their own doors, which would soon consume every poor mans living; and finde him other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise; and since they had found one (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected unto them and his Country, to reward him according to his good deserts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Act 30 passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius: and, having finished all requisite business, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the multitude in hindring the decree. The newes of Minutius his advancement, was at the campe as soon as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them successively, for some longer time, should command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equal to the Dictator, but that he should never be his superior: He would 40 therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot according to the custome. Minutius was not hereby greatly pleased; for that with half of the Army he could not work such wonders as other wise he hoped to accomplish. Nevertheless he meant to do his best, and forsaking his part of the Army, incamp'd about a mile, and a half from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Livie seems to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two severall Commanders are not subordinate one unto another, nor joyned in Commission, but have each intire and absolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Camp shall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. 50 Polybius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief successively (as the two Consuls used) with Minutius, by turns. He saith that Minutius was very refractory; and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to divide the forces between them, as is said before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loose from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the proof and assurance of their liberty.

It behoved the Master of the horse to make good the opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no less careful of getting occasion to fight than was Fabius of avoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The country lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoining, had many & spacious caves; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot, thrusting them to close together, that they could not be discovered. But left by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes, he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to business little concerning them. Like unto this was the occasion, which not long before had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his own troupes with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soon caught, & so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew near, in very good order to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving afar off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly thrown himself and his followers, did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approve himself by hastening to do good, than by suffering his enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Upon Fabius's approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well wetted with a shower, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himself to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to have been saved. So from this time forwards the war proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilst his Office lasted which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vain a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came never so within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italy; took hostages of the Sardinians and Corseans; passed over into Africa; and there negligently falling to spoil the country, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the loss of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the camp, with his fellow-Consul, where they took charge of the Army.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the war quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces levied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome hear the great commendations that were given to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow; but he had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seem that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter; contrary to all former custome; since it was never heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honourable to do just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man to discharge the grief and anger of his own private loss, upon the ill administration of the publick.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his own worth being little or none, and his credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commi-

Commonalty were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to use the liberty of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modesty. This bold Orator stuck not to affirm, that Hannibal was drawn into Italy, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been overthrown, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but, had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius when he commanded over all as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, the war would never be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians as had long since been advanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobility, and contemned the meaner sort, ever since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meer new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could with more, than to keep it, by well deserving of them. By such persuasions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other virtue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alledged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose; and he again deposed: either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevail in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum took name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in use at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens or Decuries, and governed successively, by the space of five dayes, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Editors, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only upon the chief or Virgins, carrying the Ensigns of power. This custome was retained in times of the Consuls; and put in use, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrats of the old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the election were not like to go as they would have it, there needed no more, than to slip five dayes, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well allwaged. Upon such change of these, that were Presidents of the election, it was also lawfull unto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publicly declare themselves to seek those offices. But no device would serve against the generall favour borne unto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed over, and the malice of the Fathers, against the virtue (as it was believed) of this mean, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had urged the business to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gave over. For whereas men of ordinary mark had stood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and opposit. So L. Emilius Paulus, he who few years since had overcome the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome was urged by the Nobility to stand for the place; which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himself any more in such great business of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service, he, and M. Livius that had been his companion in office, where afterwards injuriously vexed by the people, and called unto judgement: wherein Livius was condemned, and Emilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honourably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grievous losse, the other bravely winning, in the most happy victory that ever befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the war: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he

he would work, and that he would aske no more, than once to have a fight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day: yet the providence and care of Paulus travell'd more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Consuls Servilius and Atilius, desiring them to abstain from hazard of the main chance; but nevertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Army which they were now levying, they might finde the four old Legions well accustomed to the enemy, and the enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters, wherein the whole Senate assist him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refuse the slanders, with which Terentius and his adherents had burdened them. What number of men they rais'd, it is uncertain. Fourscore thousand foot, at the least, and six thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barly, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his own estate would fall to ruine, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsell, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the war from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Octavius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly pass over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, do much more serve to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawn into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twenty five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus, another of the Prætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip, the son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little soever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavill about forciture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilst the City was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near unto Hannibal as possibly they could without incurring the necessity of a battell. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the misery following. Hannibal for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans to be near him, lodged about Canusium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aside for all necessities, to the soles of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Cannæ: for the town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furnished himself, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, unless they would be troubled with far carriage.
Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himself to abide in that open Country, fit for the service of his horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battell, which he most desired.
Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand how this Peace taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seem'd needfull, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battell with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheless answer was returned unto Servilius, that he should have patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the season of the year commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their Army, set forth against Hannibal. This was always done with great solemnity: especially, whensoever they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vowes, were made unto Jupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good success and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honourable train of the principall men, (not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the war, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good wishes.
At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Emilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to doe his country remarkable service. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greatness, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to have exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous folly of his fellow-Consul.
The answer of Paulus, was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his Country: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would think it lesse rashness to adventure upon the Enemies sword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

§. VIII.

Disfension between the two Roman Consuls: Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight.
The great battell of Cannæ.

These new Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismissed M. Atilius, one of the last years Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weaknesse: Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistent. The first thing that Emilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad success hitherto, had gathered more cause of fear, than of courage. He willed them to consid-der not only now, their victories in time past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no less than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. He told them in what danger their Country stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; using some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of this Oratation, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honour, which he had gotten at Trévise & Thrasymede. Herewith-all he taxed the inconsiderate rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, untill he was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkness whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman virtue in matter of Armes, gave them cause to think, that under a Captain so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Emilius was known to be, they should easily prevail against the Carthaginians, that came short of them in all things else; save craft; which would not always thrive.
But in one thing they mistook the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of a waiting a convenient season. But they, having pre-conceived a victory, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best help; which

was, good conduct. They remembred what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the vulgar desire, of ending the war quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to use it: Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius, who was no less popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is alwayes tedious, and never more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terentius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans think themselves to have the better of their enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Disension of their chief Commanders. Varrus would fight: Emilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places less fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last years provisions, return into Campania to gather a second Harvest? This would (said Varrus) favour too much of Q. Fabius. And your haste (said Paulus) doth favour no less of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Emilius lodged six miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plains, his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Nevertheless he sat down close by Hannibal: who, as an unbidden guest, gave him but a rude welcome and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armour, fell upon the Roman Vant-couriers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loss, for that the Romans had among their Velines, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Emilius, who could not handomely withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Aufidus, sending a third part of his forces over the water, to lye upon the Easterne bank, where they entrenched themselves. He never was more unwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occasion should draw him to more equall termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches; but fortified himself, expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Gerjon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Army foraging the Country, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, That Livie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of base courtes that he devised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (saith Livie) but ten dayes provision of meat. He had not money to pay his souldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of several Nations, so that he knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run over to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himself was once upon the point, to have ston away into Gaul with all his horse, and left his foot unto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counsaill, he resolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia, to the end, that both his unfaithful Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilst he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him to that, which he most desired, even to fight a battail upon open Champain ground: wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livie, to speak the best of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their own great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he saith, Hannibal de fuga in Galliam (dicitur) agisse, Hannibal (is said) to have have be thought himself of flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more than a matter of hear-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the process it self, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaul, through the Marsibes and Bages of Herraria, could finde victuals enough, and all things needfull unto his Army, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to do the like this year; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great harvest; since he had long been Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions? Suitable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corn and cattell, his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Country, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like, and loaded his followers with spoil: having left wherewith to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie, to do the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who give it as a principall commendation unto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations, no less different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men soever fought bravely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian, but solemnly protected and sowed, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserve and seek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a senselesse device. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army, took so little pleasure in the Country and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now do there with his horse, or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to live, having betrayed all his Army, and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butchery of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal takes in a manner all his directions from Livie. But of this & the like it is enough to say. That all Historians love to extoll their own Country-men; and where a loss cannot be dissembled, nor the honour of the victory taken from the Enemy, & given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgovernment of their own forces: as if they might easily have won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lye encamped upon the River Aufidus. Varrus was perfwaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word unto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vain, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to use his own authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the first break of the day he began to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him, and sought, as in former times, to have disswaded him from putting the estate of his Country to a needlesse hazard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could alledge none other than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battell at their Trenches: should they endure this Bravado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Camp; and drove them shamefully to run within their defenses, which also they made offer to assail: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Emilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, he took all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater camp opposite unto the Carthaginian, to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity he was less able to spare from the battail, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Consuls went over the water with their Army to the lesser Camp, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battail: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed likewise over, somewhat higher up the stream, which ran from the South; leaving in his own camp so many, as he thought would serve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men, He bad them look about them, and view the ground well; upon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune than to joyn battail with the Romans upon such a level ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevail? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are sure to lose them. As for these Romans, I was fain to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may even encourage your selves, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as seen. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Country, and fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many hours passe, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what work they were likely to have with these Romans? Work enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them never so diligently, thou shalt not find one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the sad mood of his brother with a jest, and shew himself merry unto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himself had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gams, before the battail of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the first: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners, and enow to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when battail is at hand, to work upon such passions, as must govern more of the business: especially, where other needfull care is wanting; without which they are but vain boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himself; expressing no lesse perfection of his military skill, than was greatness in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousness of the place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his enemies to battail; He marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doe best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troops, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name, Enfans Perdus; but when we use our own termes, the forlorn hope. The groffe of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoils which they had gotten at Trebia, Trafalment, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deep in File. Between these he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed each after their own Country manner; their shields alike; but the Gauls using long broad swords, that were forcible in a down-right stroak; the Spaniards, short and well pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their navell upwards, as confident in their own fierceness: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple. This

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of body, and furious in giving charge, but soon wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more wary; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to return, and renew the fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughness of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper; so the place which they held in this battail, added confidence joyntly unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was grown terrible in Spain, by their Conquests; and in Gaul, by this their present war. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to employ the uttermost of their hardiness, as knowing that the enemy could not presse far upon them, without further ingaging himself than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had hapned, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gauls and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should be overhardly pressed. So, casting them into the form of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vant-guard: the two points of this great half Moon, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawn it, being narrow and thin, as serving only to guide it orderly back, when need should require: the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened and thickened against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have been so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behind it: though such figures, cut in brass, as I have seen of this Battail, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appear: as also in the same figures it is omitted, that any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rear, to second the Gauls and Spaniards, when they were driven to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood between the last ranks of his long Battalions, and in the head of his Rear, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Between the left Battalion and the River Ausidus, were the Gauls and Spanish horse, under the command of Afdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Livie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himself, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Rear. The whole summe of Hannibals Army in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and He, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the usuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deep than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had been found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rear, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, under shelter whereof the disordered troupes might rally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battalies accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of imbattailing was very unprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than upon a long flank. As for Emilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very weariness unto the more contentions. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, under the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other associates: Cn. Servilius the former years Consul, had the leading of the battail. The Sun was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

slingers of the Balears: Asdrubal brake upon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of service on horse-back, used in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line. Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and break thorow. Wherefore they not only used their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so their horses running from under them, fell many to the ground; where starting up again, they began to deal blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were over born, and driven by plain force to a staggering recoil. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, unequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battails came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found work enough, and somewhat more than enough, to break that great Crescent, upon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battail drew towards the midst; by whose aid, these opposites were forced to disband, and flye back to their first place. This they did in great haste and fear: and were with no lesse haste, and tollly pursued. Upon the Africans that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foul; both for that there was void room enough; and forasmuch as the Rear, or Hornes of this Moon, pointed into the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retreat, or flight of the Gaules and Spaniards, it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limb or utter compass of the half Moon, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turn the inside outward: the horns or points thereof, as yet, untouched, only turning round, & recoyling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an half circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming unable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot been cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that fled before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they enclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not pass far, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undiscerned, untill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themselves, as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would have been so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulk of their Army, into the throat of slaughter; had they seen those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashness of inferiour Captains: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in war, being vanquished in horse, had put himself among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that he and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, having broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed upon them along the River side, beating down and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himself was either driven upon his own Legions, or willingly did cast himself among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Nevertheless he cheered up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own stout behaviour: beating down and killing many of the enemies with his own hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battail; and with better success. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakness, to forsake his horse. Hannibal & Mago company alighted, thinking that the Consul had given order so to do: as in many battails, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in distresse. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Consul had willed his horse men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand & foot: meaning that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was marvellously troubled by Uanno (or Mahabal) and the Numidians: who beating up and down about that great sandy Plain, raised a foul dust; which a strong South wind, blowing there accustomedly, drave in to the eyes and mouths of the Romans. These, using their advantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consull and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battails were even ready to joyn; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behind their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and, throwing down their armes, rendred themselves. This was good luck to begin withall, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as he bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Under their jackets they had short swords and poniards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field of such as were slain, and therewithall slew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilst all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plain levell ground, found means to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Asdrubal, having in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in pieces all, save the Company of Emilius that rushed into the grove of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the River and their own Battalions; did not stay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joyned, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearfull cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme unto those upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more work toward, than they could hope to sustain; thought it the best way, to avoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was no less wise than they, in apprehending the greatness of his own perill; nor more desperate, in striving to work impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many thrank from him, to sustain the impression alone, which he could not have indured with their assistance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heels of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that service. Asdrubal himself, with the Gauls and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pitifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whither or which way, whilst every one sought to avoid those enemies, whom he saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got up to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly understood how they could do, yet I will rather believe it, than suppose that Livie so reporteth, to grace thereby his History with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he saw the Consul sitting all bloodied upon a stone, invited him to rise and save himself; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it, willing Lentulus to shift for himself, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought again into judgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himself.

self of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast as well they could; and telling Fabius, that he loved and died mindfull of his whole (same counsaile). These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul uttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawn to that Battail, or when he beheld the first defeat of his Horie; at what time he put himself in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul and his troupe, in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a sack; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Asdrubal with his horie, closed up the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and began the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Amilius therefore, who could not sit his horie, whilest the battail yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himself, was now (had he never so well been mounted) unable to flye, having in his way so close a throng of his own miserable followers, and so many heaps of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth unto his honour, That in the Battail he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had warily before, both abstained himself, and dissuaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly lost, it had lien in his power to save his own life unto the good of his country, never more needing it; I should think, that he either too much esteemed himself; or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Amilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, son to that famous Earle of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battell of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Amilius was old, grievously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, unhurt, easily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battail, and not meaning to stain his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble son to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, save two or three thousand, who (as Livie saith) escaped into the lesser camp; whence the same night, about six hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater camp, as were willing to try their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about four thousand foot, and two hundred horie, partly in whole troupes, partly dispersed, into Cannussum: the next day the Roman camps, both lesse and greater, were yielded unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Ausidus (as was shewed before) to set upon the camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-near done, the battail was lost: and Hannibal, coming over the water to them, drave them into their own camp; which they quickly yielded, having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, coming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vain, retired into their camp, and held the enemy buied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not half full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Canna, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Roman horie what numbers escaped, it is uncertain: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Consul recovered Penusa, with threecore and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvel: for Penusa lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his nearest way thither, had been through the midst of Hannibals Army, if the passage had been open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned up some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but took other wayes, and were scattered over the fields; two thousand, or thereabout, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slain, all save three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battail of Canna, besides L. Aemilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourscore Senators, or such as had borne office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall mark, as having been Ediles, Prætors or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last years Consul, and Minnius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battail, Livie makes no greater than three thousand foot, & three hundred horse: too few to have defended for the space of one half hour, both the Roman Camps, which yet the same Livie saith, to have been over-cowardly yielded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no less than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past; but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yielded in the greater camp, when their company were either slain or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some four thousand Gauls, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the joy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the war had presently been at an end. But he beleev'd not so far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a victory.

Of things following the battail at Cannæ.

NOT without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, unto whose honour they consecrated their travails, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemn this liberty of censure, which Polybius hath used. For, to recompence his juniority (such as it was) he produceth substantiall arguments, to justifie his own Relation; and confuteth the vanity of those former authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think better and more honourably than he deserved, of his owne Country. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall have some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some works of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least hear both sides speak: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his help, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things, and beleve so much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reason, or (at least) fair probability. This attentive circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the repugnancy, or forgetfulness, which we find in the best Narration of things following the Battail of Canna. For it is said, that four thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got into Cannussum, choosing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terentius Varro, joyning his company unto those of Scipio at Cannussum, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well-near ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen; that had been taking order for pacifying those tumults in the City, which grew upon the first bruit of the overthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent unto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretty while before he wrote those letters, which overtook (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the overthrow.

overthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutual dependency in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman camp, and trussed up the spoils, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman party, and make alliance with Carthage. The first town that opened the gates unto him, was Cossa, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, he hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him; nor only in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Country, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving respect unto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he used unto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now after this great victory at Canna, He had lovingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate against him that had fought to deliver them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their love by gifts; pretending to admire their valour, but seeking indeed, by all ways and means, to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also he began to deal kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that he bore no mortal hatred unto their Estate; but being provoked by injuries, sought to right himself and his Country; and fought with them, to try which of these two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should bear sovereign Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransom: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Noble man of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feel the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much adversity, and could stoop unto desire of peace. But with the Romans these arts prevailed not, as still he shewed in due place. The people of Italy, all, or most of them, save the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their losses past; but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not until the former generation utterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits; but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italy most bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutual affinities therewith as straightly conjoined, as were any save the Latines, changed on a sudden their love into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italy, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, answerable unto the country, whereof it was Head, so great, fair, and wealthy, that it seemed no less convenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, bravery is the least requisite unto sovereign command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like Javes by their feathers, despised the unfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especial regard unto the Majesty of Rome, and could not indure to hear of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavins an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was up-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their city to the Carthaginians shortly after the battail of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journey into Campania: the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the meanness of the Roman Army, or some other fear of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacy: or had leisure served, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle usage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) unable to hold any such negotiation, without advice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yield up their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithful meaning, were driven to sit still in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their own cowardize. The people holding so tender a regard of liberty, that even the lawful government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to fear lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans bring them under a more straight subjection, than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break into some outrage, Pacuvius made use of, to serve his own ambition. He discoursed unto the Senate, as they sat in Council, about these motions troubling the city: and said, That he himself had both married a Roman Lady, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking of the Roman party was not now the greatest: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to joyn themselves with Hannibal, who should countenance the fact, and save them harmless. This he spake, as a man well known to be beloved himself by the People, and privie unto their designs. Having thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: He promised nevertheless to deliver them all, and to let things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands, offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting up the Court, and placing a guard of his own followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leave; He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them, that these wicked Governours were surprised by his policy, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he advised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger upon the old. So rehearsing unto them the names of one or two Senators; he asked what their judgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Choose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, unprovided for such an election, was silent; until at last, some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were utterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, baseness and insufficiency; or else even because they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest man to be substituted, having been named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius intreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtless) they would make; having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for saving all their lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this by all obsequiousness, to court the People; giving the reines unto their lawless Will, who else were likely to cast them down. All the city being thus of one mind; only fear of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battail at Canna, this impediment was removed; and few there were that would open their mouths to speak against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serve the Romans in the Ile of Sicily: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent unto Terenus the Consul, to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Fear. These, wheresoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented unto them the greatness of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost; and that the Campanians must now, not help the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to help themselves, but make war in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Samnites. Hereunto he is said to have added a foolish Invective against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcasses, & to feed upon mans flesh; with such other stufte, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campanians themselves,

He put them in mind of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; with money, and all provisions, in abundance: Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before they were somewhat timorous in adventuring to seek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, upon these conditions; that the Campanians should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should be subject unto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soever, whether in War or Peace; and that Hannibal should deliver unto the Campanians three hundred Roman prisoners, such as themselves would chuse, whom they might exchange for their 10 Gentlemen which were in Siail.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, opposed himself earnestly: using, in vain, many persuasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors unto Hannibal, and this also did he, when the new alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the town: at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of service, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forsaken. 20

Advertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples, not farre off, sent for Magius to come speak with him in the camp. This Magius refused: alledging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection unto any Carthaginians; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon halted himself towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided to lay siege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnity and pomp: all the people issuing forth of the town, to behold that great Commander, which had won so many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly City, and passed over his first entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italy and Rome it self, should be driven to acknowledge Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not think him a Campan, but a traitor to the State, and use him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand upon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal: who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, by putting to great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal sealed his friendship with the Campanians: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speak against him; being assisted by Perella the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perella would have murdered Hannibal, whilst he was at supper, the first night of his coming; had not his fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the town (besides) were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath. 40

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other towns thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casertine, and Acerre, were the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled towns; but were faine to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the inhabitants. Rome it self was in extreame fear of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Canna: and the grief of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the losse already received, or the fear of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courtiers were sent 50 sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Furro had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books, busied alive two men and women, Gauls and Greeks, in their Oxe-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions; we may justly think that Sibyl her self was instructed by the Diuel. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the oracle of Apollus; & enquire with what prayers and supplications 10 ons they might pacifie the gods, and attain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatnes of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Siail, from the Prætor Ostacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africk. In these were contained newes of one Carthaginian fleet that wasted the kingdome of Hieron their good friend & confederate; & of another fleet, riding among the Isles Ægætes, which was in readines to set upon Lilybanus, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terenius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take sovereign charge of the Weal publique, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of 20 people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weal-publique. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely for upholding the generall reputation. If this coming into the City had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Livie would have us think, that it was done generally, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I belevee him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator, and T. Sempronius, Master of the 30 horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised four new Legions, and 1000. horse: though with much difficulty; as being faine to take up some that were very boyes. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten in account of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; four new ones of Prætextati, or striplings were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them 8000. sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manfull service. This notwithstanding, the Dictator proclaimed, That whosoever ought money & could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the spoils of their enemies that had been there set up: among which, were 6000. Armours of the Gauls, that had been carryed in the Triumph of G. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought 40 the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was that Carthalo with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captives audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition to be ransomed at the publick charge; not only the rears and lamentation of their poor kinsfolk, but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending 50 their

their suit; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken prisoner in the former War) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy; much was alleged against these who now craved ransom: but the special point was, that they were wilfully left, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not unto these poor men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the disburisment: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we finde recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the slaves which were armed for the war, were said to have cost more, than the sum did amount unto, that would have ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had been severe; when as indeed the were suitable to the present fortune, poor and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Masters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ransom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withall consider, that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forebear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchised) until the War should be ended. If Hannibal would have given such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but, seeing he dealt only for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, upon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was used toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great Battell. These were charged for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done so. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call Regione del Stato, may serve for an excuse, when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miserable exigent, is faine to help it self, by doing injuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans: now: condemning all those that had served at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serve, not as others did, until they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or else were fifty years of age, but until this War should be ended, how long soever it lasted, and that without reward. The same thrifty censure was afterwards laid upon others, for their mis-behaviour: but never upon any man of quality, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brain'd fooles his companions; who, being frightened out of their wits, with the terror of so great a losse, were devising, after the battell, which way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one town within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheless it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, took the field with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot finde: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evill: for of any evill done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofstia, with a Fleet ready to set sail for Sicily, having one Legion aboard his ships; and fifteen hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces he was to defend that Island, and do what harm he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, he sent these of his new Levie to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Caunissium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived even time enough enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haven, whereby it stood in the less fear of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoyl of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Country. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid wait, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: & such talk used some, that had little fear of their owne private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chief; a stout young Gentleman, and Souldier of especial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good service to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal half dead at Canna; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greatest thanks he could unto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himself also a man highly reputed for his personal valour, he made this Bantius so far in love with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assay'd, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by composition; and so returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stir in his quarrell, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Town, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Town; which he sought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the multitude within the Town should presently rise, and seizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, even to find him busied within the City, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the wals; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the Enemies hope, and send him away betimes.

Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three severall gates, looking towards the enemy: he gave a straight command, that all the Citizens should keep their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the wals were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very wals, and thought nothing less, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected fall the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like sort issued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backs. The sudden terrour was more available unto the Romans, than their force; yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that War, so far as such as hereby it was first proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, took a strict account of the Citizens of Nola; condemning above threecore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the mean season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdom to lose time in perswasions, but laid siege unto it, and began on all sides to close it up. This terrified the People, who knew themselves unable to hold out. Therefore, before his Works were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal, as being unwilling that an Enemy so near should disquiet him at Capua, where he meant to Winter. It seems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army seek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most; and those not slain in plain battail, but by a sudden eruption; with little chiefly, in what great fear they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that having three years since demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleasure, by his own Citizens, could now please themselves, as with good newes, to hear, That in a skirmish not far from Rome, he appeared to be a man, and not resistless. At Caslinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Præfines there were, and about four hundred of Persians, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battail at Canus, being sent by their severall States to the Camp: whither whilest they were marching the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, and sent them back sorrowfull, for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua. How that great City became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Præfines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many trains laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Western part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place winneth, upon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more work than he expected. Divers assaults he gave, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River: who fain would have relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him an expresse charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the overflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his journey, such entreaties were needless. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreame famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of corn were sent by night, floating down the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of water, stuck among the Willows on the bank, whereby this manner of relief was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the stream, which faintly sustained the poor besieged men. At length when all food was spent, and whatsoever grew green under the Walls was gathered for Sallets, the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground; whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seed. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Casiline until the Rapes were grown. Wherefore though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ransom; which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them, according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he restored it. To the Præfines Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were in Præfines: which is no weak proof, of the good estate, where in the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans: as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have been better spent. For winter overtook him long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintred at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appear hereafter.

10 The great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italic. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians; how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the son of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battell at Canus; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded or slain, how the Rout Romans, that in the former war never shunned any occasion of fight, were now grown so calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he never durst adventure to come to battell; That not without reason their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them above two hundred thousand, and taken above fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that followed the fortune of those great victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief seat of their Dominion in Italy: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had been entertained, where he meant to rest that winter attending their supply. As for the war, he said it was even at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was far from home, in the Enemies Country: that so many battels had much diminished his brothers Army; that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corn, and other necessities; but that these things must be sent from Carthage; which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, he caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slain, to be poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels; or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatness of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the principall of that order, were accustomed to wear that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punic Warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance the coast, any such hopeful advertisements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvel, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilce, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perswader unto peace with Rome, whether

* Thus Livie reports it; and credible it is, that while Rome was poor; the bravery of private men was not altogether so great; as the Law would have permitted, though otherwise Jus Annus The wearing of the Ring, was the generally-privilege of the Roman Senators.

Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded up unto the Romans, or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for this their good success. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formall answer, which Livie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a term proper to the Romans; and putting them in minde of his own shamefull overthrow received at the Ilands Agates: yet the summe of his speech appears to have been no lesse malicious than it is set down, forasmuch as Hannibal himself, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed against the wickedness of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Family, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported, saying, It ill befecemed him, who had vanquished the Romans to call for more help as if he had been beaten, or him, that had taken their camp, filled forsooth with spoil, to make request for meat & money. To these cavils, if answer were needful, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman camp: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few * silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any main convoy of money and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great army in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards said to have done, when they wan the camp of Asdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italy) then might such an objection more justly have bin made unto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he best might hope to prevail, contained a perswasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seek peace, whilst they had so much the better in war.

What would have been the issue of this counsell, if it had bin followed, it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of war; yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have bin kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shamefull overthrows; since after this war ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer, than untill such time as Rome was at leisure from all other wars. This counsell therefore of Hanno, though it might seem temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a main consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should be sent over to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, should be levied in Spain; not only to supply, as need should require, the Armies in their Province, but to be transported into Italy.

This great aid, had it been as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to tax the retchlesse improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannae to Rome, or in refreshing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finished the business, with lesse dangerous adventure; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanians, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following Warre. But either the too much carelesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreme necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than sense of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been so well set down. The * Elephants were sent: and some money peradventure, uncertain it is how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and four thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of warre. Only some small numbers, no way answering unto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain; and the journey of Asdrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by

by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the Warre of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse of Agates. Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans on the other side, having three or four years together been forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to go upon credit, even for the price of those slaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arme for their defence. Such advantage in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, even from Tyrrus their Mother-City in the bottome of the straights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falsehood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty City would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, having given up hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to performe whatsoever should be enjoyned them, with condition, that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yielded up all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Town must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) This Trade of Merchandize, by which ye now live, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduring men with many laudable qualities which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though figured with glowing words, plainly shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thus I think, and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seem, not only to have had regard unto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they far short of them in the honourable care of the publick good: having every one, or most of them, a more principal regard of his own private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the war strongly) was over-past, go more leisurely to work, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italy; so going to work orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazzard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so do) finished the war, might easily make * Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that they had given him to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their own slacknesse, incredulity, dullness, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursements in Spain, than to set up all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible to hold a Country of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spain, free from all incurison of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been, to make a running Warre, by which

which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their main intendment against Rome it self, until such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province, then must Emporia have been besieged and forced: which, by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the town of Emporia, was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it self against the Barbarians, having not above four hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified: a great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Gracians, though not over much trusted. Wherefore to force this town of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would have been a work of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battell at Canna: yea, it had been in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the war; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, near unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making strong war upon their City. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the seat of the war transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessory to their own purposes, did make them easily wink at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it self, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keep the purse full. In the mean while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travell for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had bin somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far less honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weal publick above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this war present, will make them complain, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Canna; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfuls into Spain.

That both the Spanish business, and the state of Africk it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, upon successe of things in Italie, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard, and almost impossible to set down. For, though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livie, the tender love of his own Countrey, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others; yet must we not, for his sake, believe those lyes, which the unpartial judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having clean spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we finde in the life of Amilcar, set down by Amilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall, infusing such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberall. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Cainus when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay down their Arms and forsake Sicill, threatening, that otherwise he would not talk of any composition:

Amilcar

Amilcar boldly bad him chuse, whether he would talk of it or no; for that the Armes which his Country had put into his hands to use against her enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld up unto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his wil, & not to stand with him upon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were farr from thinking him a man coniumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with untruth, saying, that howsoever Amilcar and his Souldiers had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished or tyred, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman story) & those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty city of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Livie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his own shamefull overthrow at the Ilands * Agatis, with the great services of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet elsewhere he forbearth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affairs of Carthage went never better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battail at Sea: wherein himself was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, & others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of their relations, which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the son of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italy.

It hath been shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul returning from Gaulle into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with fourteen thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse, had been allotted unto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal: who, since he was marching into Italy with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio beleaved, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; & therefore made bold to carry some of the number back with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himself remained in Italy all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, he was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Army of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battails, and withdrew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often finde means to repair his forces, and return strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst adventure to break it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serve to arme the Naturals against these Invaders; and to reclaim so those, that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poor, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or serving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peradventure, if we durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great, as they are set out by Livie. This we may be bold to say, that the great Captain Fabius, or Livie in his person, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Asdrubal, being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battell, save only by the steep descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his money, Elephants, and broken troupes, over Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; upon which he fell with more than three score thousand armed Souldiers. Neither do I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so have they said to have done in the last battell between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this War, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us: unto whom it were no wisdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spain; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven town, not far within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the fame of his clemency he allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the story begins of him, I could easily believe, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meer stranger, and having no jurisdiction in the Country. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better success, for that he seemed to have none other errand, than setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with money: and some he compelled to yield by force or fear; especially when he had won a battail against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is, that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgoe, unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiors, Majestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conservent, which is, as Tullius interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Majesty of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romanæ, of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found at his coming among them such an apprehension of the Roman greatness, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it, for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Country unto Hanno and his Heirs.) He made him not onely Lieutenant-generall over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferior Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanais, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French, as more sensible still of the present evill which they felt, then regardfull of the greater mischief, whereinto they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affection of this Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which, it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a battail with Scipio; wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stisium, a town hard by, and won it, it. But Asdrubal having passed Iberus, and coming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far from Turracon, whom he found careless, as after a victory, roaving abroad in the country; and with great slaughter drove them aboard their ships. This done, he ran up into the County, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman party, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where having set things in order, he returned back, and made toward Asdrubal, who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himself again over Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force; having lost Athanasia their chief City, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Astetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chief Town: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vain, that the sharp Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were fain at length to yeeld: and for this their oblinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came to help their distressed Neighbours, and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any caute remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we hear of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold War against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred up the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilst himself had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Country, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stir, untill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio won, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deep Snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably think, that they fought their own benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening again unto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their own Country Lawes, and not under Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testify: even from henceforth unto the dayes of Augustus Cesar, till when they were never thoroughly conquered.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ran not too farre on ground, he took: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flye into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himself in Lucitania. Yet it follows, that the Ilergetes did again rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him hostages. These took from the Carthaginian three Towns, and vanquished him in two battails; wherein they flew fifteen thousand of his men, and took four thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and hence forward the two brethren joyntly administrated the business in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did hand cunctanter, without both fear or doubt, passe over Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Liv. lib. 21.

Asdrubal, Bosfor, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be persuaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the country, was by freely restoring unto them their hostages; as resting without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: perfwading them, as he had done Bosfor, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchased much love, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we finde that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleieve so few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selves with these.

The year following was like unto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten four thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet, and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Masters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans: because they had been chidden the last year for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navie. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. These do much mischief, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assail him, that they drive him for very fear, to encamp himself strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battail. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and dispereth the rest: so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should lead his Army forth into Italy, which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or if they will needs have it so, that then they must send him a successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to employ they should finde work more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse; Asdrubal must needs be gone: Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that service, both by land and sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himself with store of money, that he might have wherewithall to win the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembering to ease him of his care. But since it can be no better, he layes great Impositions upon all the Spaniards his subjects: and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest town in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him and fight a battell with him: which they win the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory, & afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slain: and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ran away ere the battails were fully joyned. Their Camps so the Romans take and spoil: whereby (questionlesse) they are marvellously enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spain being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes event joynes all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Country stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himself safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisements is sent to Rome, and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they have neither money, apparell, nor bread, wherewith to sustain their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: so as unlesse they may be supplied from

Rome

Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an evil season; the State being scarcely able, after the loss at Canna, to help it self at home. Yet relief is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the relation of things whereof the truth is less questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we think, that remember the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his own safety? They find him, and Magus and Amilcar the son of Bomilcar, with an Army of threecore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Orelius, and others, probably conjecture to have stood, where Carimena is now in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgi, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Town of the Illergenes their nearest Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The town is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore brake through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible laughter of all that resist them: and having victualled the place, encourage the townsmen to defend their wals as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threecore thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, drave all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarter; and took that day, besides prisoners and other booty, fifty and eight Ensignes.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon Incibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by war, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting money of his own; and being beaten in his journey, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Camp was taken after the battell by Ibera. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custom) are beaten again at Incibili: where there were of them above thirteen thousand slain, and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensigns, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius, Autius, or some other Historian, to whom Livie gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year, by winning famous victories, whereof these good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum Altum, a place in the midway between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Country round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off clear; falling also upon some stragglers, or such as lagged behinde their fellows in march; they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoefull, to retire unto some place more assured. So Publ. withdraws himself unto Mons victoria: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, over-looketh the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Asdrubal the son of Geseo, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus near incamped together, P. Scipio with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himself to an high piece of ground, where they besiege him, until his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castello, a great city of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Betis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians passe over Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garriſon, hoping to win it by famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Castello, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten

the year before. But thither they goe: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion? who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them the next day, and in two battels kills above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with six and thirty Ensigns. This victory (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians beseege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda; where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great battail fought, that lasteth four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensigns. The Carthaginians flee to Auriges; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquished the Carthaginians again: but kills not half so many of them, as before, good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people feared even by nature to set war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troups of Asdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalf of that City, they had at first entred into this war. And well may we think it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Country once and again. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to go their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for having so long forborne to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to performe. At the present they won Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof unto such of the poor dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had ministred unto Hannibal matter of quarrel against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them if they had been able.

But overlooking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals journey; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporia, an Haven town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phoceans, kin to the Masilians, friends to the Romans; They have easily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost again, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their own unfetled passions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held inire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily believe, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we think, that all those battails lately remembered, after every one of which Asdrubal late down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the war from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their own places of strength, and therein to attend the levy and arrivall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole year following, in practising only with the Celtiberians the next adjoining people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two years business. Of these Celtiberians we hear before, That they have yeelded up themselves unto the Romans; for security of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serve in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; perceive; unless perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Livie follows, to call every messenger, or straggler, that entered their camp, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to help the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are choisen, and carryed into Italy, there to deal with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his wars. But if any of these three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellows at home are the less unwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next have a desire to lead them into Italy. Hercof we finde more than probability, when these mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this accesse of strength, divide their forces, and seek out the Enemies, who lie not far off with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the son of Gisco, leaving the newes, will make use of their distance, which is five dayes march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Country, save themselves from being overtaken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army; leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gisco, are not studying how to run away: they finde no such necessity. They joyne their forces together; meet with Publius Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driven to keep himself close within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himself not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masaniissa, Prince of the Masseyli, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizzen: to whom the chief honour of this service is ascribed, for that he comes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Susstani, to joyn with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be straight shut up, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way, leaving T. Fonteius his Lievtenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis, but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians far behinde; but come so fast upon him in Rear, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turne, yet fighting and animating his men, where need most requireth, is struck through with a lance, and slain: very few of his Army escaping the same destiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had war in their owne Country. If Anitorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beutenus takes it, a Celtiberian town; this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly believe, that they were won by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their lives. Cn. Scipio therefore being unable to stay them, and no less unable, without their help, either to resist the enemy, or to joyn with his brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard upon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steals from them all by night; but is overtaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stony ground, where grows not so much as a shrub, unfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliade. These weak defences the Carthaginians soon tear in tunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that saving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoining, escape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could break out, and throwd themselves within woods adjoining, I should much wonder, did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's camp, on the North side of Iberus, tearfull (as may be supposed) of his own life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawn some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to chuse a Generall by most voices, prefer this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, comming upon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slain) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he bears the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely founds the retreat, reserving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldness grows, in enemies lately vanquished, and now again little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former security; and utterly despising him, set neither Corps de garde nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were near. Martius therefore animates his Souldiers with lively words; and tells them, That there is no adventure more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being undertaken. They are soon perswaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leads them forth by night, and steals upon the Camp of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleep, or very drowlie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabines, and gives a terrible alarm; so that all affrighted the Carthaginians runne head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Camp, Martius hath prepossest, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping down the Rampart: which as many do, as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay six miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two camps he hath bestowed a Roman cohort; and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarm before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soon as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning upon this further camp: which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloodied with their former execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can save themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirty seven thousand of the enemies perish in this nights work; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the camp of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slain; and that in another battail with Asdrubal, there were slain ten thousand more; besides four thousand three hundred and thirty taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Livie therefore hath elsewhere well observed, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battails. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livie reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distress, He could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far less than that which is here set down.

Of these occurrences L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his own good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vice-gerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, He stiled himself Propretor. The Fathers were no less moved with the tidings than the case required: and therefore took such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the companies levied to serve that Province, could be sent away; yet could they not stay a tide for defence of the City it self, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for the title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about six thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affairs of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise the victories of Martius would ill have served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Martius and Fonteius, he found surer tokens of the overthrowes received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaim, it would not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausani, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides arvi, out of which there was no issue, but only through a straight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himself thus lockt up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition that he and his Army might be thence dismissed. That he spent many dayes, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this business; That night by night he conveyed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain; we shall find no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creep out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far lesse value. Howsoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity were needfull to work regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publius, likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the son of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the war into Africa: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other virtues that purchase love; of which qualities what great he made, shall appear in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, favouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity, How he used to walk alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; How a Dragon (which must have been one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entering her Chamber often; and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome: that this noble City might seem, not only to have surpassed other Nations in virtue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorn this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconfull was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principall Citizens offer himself as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart to adventure himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on an high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested and obtained, that the office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreams: and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nere, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I find in the too partial Roman Historians, I do not willingly insift.

P. Scipio was sent Proconful into Spain; & with him was joyned M. Junius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carryed with them ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinguereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia, and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the same of Scipio's arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a majesty, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their fear, by how much the lesse they could give any reason of it. If we must believe this, then must we needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some think, all the next year) he did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their counsil in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Town by Land and Sea; and won it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered unto Scipio, a secret passage unto the wals; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing upon a demy-Iland, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Western side of the wals, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had sounded; and finding some part thereof a shelf, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navill, Scipio thrust therein some companies of his men; who recovered the top of the wals without resistance: the place being left without guard; as able to defend it self by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City, easily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Town, Livius himself cannot certainly affirm; but is fain to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceive how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk and Spain was heaped up in that one Town. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoining Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie; restoring them unto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, nearest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vaunt himself, as commonly fugitives use, of the pleasure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies, but rather excused this his changing side, as being there-to compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Scipio: then could nothing have been devised more vain, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans never masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won unto himself the assured love and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet nevertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, having stolon a Town by surpris, was too far transported, and over-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his mood, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine own conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them, undertook new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occasion, fate down before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage over the Lake had been undiscovered, and the Town held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue upon the first day: yet in the generality of the business, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey, Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingering War of taking and retaking Towns, whilst the main of the Carthaginian forces, under Asdrubal, the son of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprize: even to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for fear, as thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but hear the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming upon Asdrubal, his Vant-curers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drave them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that small piece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the River, very steep of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore side, by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whereon he strongly encamped himself: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plain: into which he descended, more upon bravery, that he might not seem to hide himself within the Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battail, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain, up into his Camp on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drave both men and Elephants head-long. I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flye. Out of such a battell, wherein he had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to have marched toward the Pyrenes, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, are reported after this to have consulted with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his comming into Italy, whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs have too long detained us.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Posthumus the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedonia enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans, joining with the Aetolians, make war upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to interdict their business against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good news from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans corn into his own barns, and to drive away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled towns in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended, the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring following, untill corn were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Canna. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his first coming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious success would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battail; if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of necessities to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seem) from the walls of Rome, he had presented himself unto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unless they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and travel was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege unto that proud City, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the winter was passed over joyfully, saving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring grew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought over the Alpes, had been lost in his journey through the Marishes of Heiruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was too tight a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spain and Gaule, as he himself had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the main strength of their City, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seek, as well as he can, to satisfy his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year served, He took the field: and having finished what rested to be done at Castilnum, sought to make himself Master of some good Haven-town thereabout; that might serve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to do what else was needfull, He sent Himilco unto the Lucrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicil and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or overtaken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue above two thousand of his men; with the loss of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped far better. By help of the Bruntians, his good friends, he won Petellia, or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consentia, and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over against Sicil.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanians and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seem to prove the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Sovereignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefite allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for help: where their messengers received answer from the Senate, That the publick misfortunes had not left means, to relieve their Associates that were so far distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publickly sent from Cities of the Roman subjection, that had a private jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to give them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Town, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation again: and having thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to give any relief. Wherefore these Embassadours were willing to return home; and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own safety, as having already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and having striven in vain to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility gave to the Carthaginians a bloody victory over them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Asilianis.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them into terms of great extremity. For whereas, in a great bravery, before their loss at Canna, they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithstanding the great war that lay upon them so near at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumus Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pinus they had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past; willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliver Hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demetrius Phariar their Subject and Rebell, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; through which he was to pass. Against his coming, the Enemies had sawed the trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them down. When therefore Posthumus, with his whole Army, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls that lay about the wood, began to cast down the trees: which falling one against another, bore all down to fast, that the Romans were overwhelmed, Men and Horses, in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious work of sawing so many trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blown all down before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject; I do not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have been done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Country now so Civil, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumus his skull, being cleaned and trimmed up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the use of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no less than the calamity. But sorrow could give no remedy to the mischief: and anger was vain, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I find, that any was a second time demanded; this we find, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even termes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus: not commanding their duty, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having assured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leisure to look into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, upon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman war, until it were finished: That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoil therein to be gotten, should be left entire unto the State of Carthage; and that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, until he had subdued all his enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving seemingly unto him the full possession of that country, and the Isles adjoining. But such predisposition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the divine Providence, which therein shewes 10 it self, not (as Herodotus falsely termes it, and like an Atheist) envious or malicious, but very just and majestically, in upholding that unspeakable greatness of Sovereignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadors that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and people, and offer his help in this time of great necessity. These newes were so welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should lead them the way, and shew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus 20 instructed concerning their journey, fell wilfully into the camp of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion, and concluded the business, about which they came, upon the points before remembered. In their return homeward, they happened again unluckily to be descryed by the Roman Fleet; which mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chase. They did their best to have escaped: but being overtaken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it again, That having been sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were not able by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Prætor, unto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now less credible than 30 before: and (which marred all) Gesco, Boslar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquisition served to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals own letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole business confected. The Embassadors and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome, where the chief of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before; only with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian war, in an evil hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble resolution, and sutable unto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beate upon them from Spain. They judged it more easie, with small forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegiance, not only of the Latines, and other, their most faithfull Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all privileges of the City, it will appear by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quinquageme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and 50 to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begun. Philip was busie about the Sea towns, that looked towards Italy, setting upon Apollonia, and thence falling upon Oricum, which he won, and so returned to Apollonia again. The Epirots craved help of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers, who had none other business to do. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Town-men in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip was then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily regained the Town; and sent thence a thousand thousand men, under Navius Crispus, an undertaking and expert Captain; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable fallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with lo great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said, to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped up the mouth of the River, so that he was faine to burn his ships, (which belike were no better than long boats) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation always enemy to the Crown of Macedon: and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath else where been shewed) to make strong war on Philip: wherein he promised them 10 great assistance from the Romans. That which most moved the troubleome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long, and whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promise, as if already it had been his own. So a league was made between them: and afterward solemnly published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, that from Ætolia to Coreyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Country should be subdued, and left unto the Ætolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision, to hold no longer than whilest he obtained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the only point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promised as 20 much on the Romans behalf, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, unless it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reserved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdileus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so far from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates are thrust into the Treaty, rather to give it countenance, than for any readines which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, & chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorimachus and others, are yet a while the only men, of whom the Roman Generals must 30 make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had only the title of Nervare, was said to court the Majors of Roche. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Army; made a countenance of war upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infect the Kingdom of Macedon; wasted the Country about Oricum and Apollonia; and over-running the Pelagians, Dardaniens, and others, whom he held suspected, came down into Thessaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stir up all the Greeks adjoining, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troubleome to all the Country. To which 40 purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Persens, his son and heir, with four thousand men, upon their borders: with the rest of his Army, before greater business should overtake and entangle him. He made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Mædes, that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whenever the King was absent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and win their little Country, ere he should be able to return. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniada and Naxos, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently situated to let in an Army and consigned them unto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, 50 to die (as we say) every mothers son of them, in defence of their Country; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who layed aside all other business) to succour these his friends; caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprife. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Acyra, which they took: the Romans assailed by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the spoil.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome, and P. Salpiti sent in his stead, to keep the war on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman help, Attalus out of Asia came over to assist the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved by his own jealousie lousie of Philips greatness: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chosen by the Ætolians their principall Magistrate: which honour, though no better than titular, he took in very loving part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being joyned with the main power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battails: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him, and used their best means to get it. But when the day appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadours, in stead of making submission, proposed unto him such intolerable conditions, as ill beleemed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being besieged in their own Towns, that had made them desirous of composition. This fear being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever: and thrust a garrison of their own, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the straight from Naupactus, wasted the country in a terrible bravery: wherein Philip required him; coming upon them in great haste from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no less than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Navie into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and upon greater reason; as being more interessed in the success of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him, to use the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first have kept those Enemies from fastening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea, it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaïans his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Town, he was encountered by the Ætolian and Roman garrison, which drove him back with some loss. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment, in his retreat from Elis: rather he had given testimony of his personal valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slain under him. He had also soon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattel, which they had brought together in a place of safety, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had hapned, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily under a low tree, had torn off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered up by an Ætolian, who carried it home, & shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horn was well known, and the tale believed. 40 All Macedon therefore was in an uproar: and not only the borderers, ready to fall upon the Country, but some Captains of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaïans. He also took order, to have Beacons erected, that might give him notice of the enemies doings, upon whom he meant shortly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-favouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betraied to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to help it: where also the strong City of Chalcis was likely to have been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hasty marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the City of Opus: This City, lying over against Eubœa, Attalus had won, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had used: now because the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves; it was need, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busied in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philips arrivall, made him leave all behinde him, and run away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships, finding the Romans gone gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this misadventure, or tydings of Prusias the Bithynian his invasion upon the kingdom of Pergamus, made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Torone, Tritonon, Drymus, and many small towns in those parts, performing likewise some actions, of more bravery than importance, against the Ætolians. In the mean season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been busied in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chosse two new kings, & to conform themselves to their old manner of government. But their estate was so far out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the City, proved no less unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose up among them: upon whom succeeded this Machanidas, and shortly after came Navis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for fear of the Achaïans, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speak more hereafter.

Philip entering into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Country; spake brave words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to do with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, such haste they made, for fear of being overtaken. But flight, he said, was not alwaies prosperous: he should one day light upon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaïans were glad to hear these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he restored unto their Nation some Towns that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymeans, that had been taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their own City. Further, passing over the Corinthian Gulf, he fell upon the Ætolians; whom he drove into the mountains and woods, or other their strongest holds, and wasted their Country. 30 This done, he took leave of the Achaïans, and returned home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they rested fearless of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make war upon the Dardaniens, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himself Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ran along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldened him to make strong war upon the Ætolians, at their own doores. As for the Romans either some displeasure, conceived against their Confederates, or some fear of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall upon Italy; caused them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætolians therefore being driven to great extremity, were faine to sue for peace unto Philip; and accept it, upon what ever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirty five gallies, came over in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium & Apollonia, making a great noise, as if with these his own forces he would work wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himself close within the wals of Apollonia, making some overtures of peace: which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serve their turn in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of

of his Army, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Piracies. Onely once they came to his help, which was at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone again before his arrivall: having done nothing, and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his own Navie, durst boldly pass by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This retchless dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seem to have been one of Hanno his tricks, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to hear that so great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affairs of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as envie could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians unto a sale and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian wars so mighty a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire, or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should do well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serve to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might finde this Enemy work abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy, and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be urged unto the prosecution, by his own necessity: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea, scarce to the labour of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to pass, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were, that the City should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might address their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no less impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsel of Hanno and his fellows were such as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their own disposition, without his advice, were too sparing, and carelesly, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he began the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very fear of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessity, he might give over the warre, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes; but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his own, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by the mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or four Towns of Illyria, which they had recovered in this war, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants, that somewhat might seem to have been gotten. On the other side, the Attinians were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would seem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Acheans, Bæotians, Theſſalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Ilum, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the tyrant of Lacedæmon, together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their league with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were never slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting down of their names in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a buſie people, and ministred occasion to renew the War, when means did better serve to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees, The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick necessities of their Common-weal.

It was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halves: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole Warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the less harmfull, if their care of Italy had been such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal to weary himself with expectation of their promised supplies: which were still deferred from year to year, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could have desired. The death of Posthumius, and destruction of his whole Army in Gaulle; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicill; as also that War of which we last spake, threatened from Macedon; happening all at one time, and that so nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have lunk the Roman State; had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter unto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, wherupon to work. For though they were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new concurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their severall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian War, should have been strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troups, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the Warre in Spain; the lingering aide which they sent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-near beaten down; their triling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hasty catching at Sicill: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the main point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered a part by it self, was no otherwise to be allowed, as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition. That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himself to Necessity; so to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumæ, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard siege, that was to be reserved for a work of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola, but always with bad sadnesse. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet under the very Wallies of the Town, having the assistance of the Citizens, that were grown better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great marvell; his forces being then divided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was even in those dayes, a strong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force.

Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was always frustrate. Upon the town of Cuma they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chief Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campanians) to be present at a solemn sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertain; but privily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of war, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have been Posthumus Albinus, that was lately slain by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they failed so to have done, because this was the first time, that ever two Plébeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gave over the place; and Q. Fabius Maximus, the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of religion or superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Army, waited upon Hannibal among the Campanians: not able to meet the enemy in field; yet intensive to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volentes, or Slaves, that lately had been armed, were no small part of his followers. These and the rest of his men, he continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Army skillfull in the exercises of war, than to keep it from quarrels that might arise by upbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum, the Senators of Cuma sent him word of all that had passed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to shew his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himself into Cuma: whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that City were expected by the Campanians. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama: three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Albius the chief Magistrate of Capua, with fourteen thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather desiring how to surprise others, than fearing himself to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might bear word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the town when it grew dark: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleep, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights service. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander, losing not above a hundred of his own men. Their camp he took; but carried not long to rife it, for fear of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his providence, he escaped a greater loss, than he had brought upon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hama, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde those young souldiers, and slaves, busied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the booty. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma, which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreaty of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their followers spent about this town. They raised a wooden Tower against it, which they brought close unto the wals; thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Tower; whence they made resistance, and found means at length to consume with fire the work of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fire, the Romans, falling out of the town at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drave them to their Trenches, with the slaughter of about fourteen hundred. The Consul wisely founded the Retreat, ere his men were too far engaged, and Hannibal in a readiness to requite their service. Neither would he, in the pride of his good success, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battell the day following, near unto the wals. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to prevail in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the siege, and returned to his old camp at Tifara. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people severely punished for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Army was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yeeded; and withall to abide (as it must do) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it self, was driven in the mean time to alter his course of war: and instead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invasion upon the whole Country, to passe from place to place; and wait upon occasions, that grew dayly more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Country of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania; by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done, when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to get the Sovereignty. They held it treason, that they should be protected by such as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gave unto their old, the more easie means to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very incentive, as necessity constrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and joyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus, whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon just reason, commended, That being himself Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formality, or regard what men might think of his ambition, but caused himself to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, served to put the Campanians in fear, that Capua it self should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, having with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden upon Festeoli, a Sea-town of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vain, hoping to have wonne it. The garrison in Festeoli was six thousand strong: and did their duty so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could only shew his anger upon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a journey against Beneventum: and T. Gracchus, the last years Consul, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about seventeen thousand foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelve hundred horse, very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Morres. He held the Roman work four hours, ere it could be perceived to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late armed slaves, had received from their Generall a peremptory denunciation, That this day or never they must purchase their liberty, bringing every man for price thereof, an enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: whether that vain labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slain enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the service by employment of so many hands in a work so little concerning the victory. Gracchus thereto: finding his own error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should have liberty immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong upon the Enemy; whom their desperate fury had soon overthrowen, if the Roman horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard upon the Roman battell, that four thousand of the slaves, (for fear either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battell unto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired unto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to save himself by flight, when the Grosse of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand, most of which were horse; all the rest were either slain or taken. The Roman Generall gave unto all his Souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but unto those four thousand, which had recoyled unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, unless sickness forced them to break his order. So the victorious army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Souldiers were feasted in publick by the town-men; some sitting, some standing, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custome of slaves manumitted) with caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired the great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasury was so poor, that no industry nor art could serve to help it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italy that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse do than before; as living upon the same trade, and subject to the same inconveniencies, which enfeebled Rome it self. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now do least for his Country, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as it money should be raised upon them by the Popl, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Eastern parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to finde him work at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother over the Alpes, as soon as he could rid himself of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driven almost even to extream want of counsell. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved upon the only course, without the which the City could not have subsisted.

They called the people to assembly; wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor laid open the publick wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stufte, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loan of their commodities and labours, untill the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain, as well supplied, as if the Treasury had been full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus, the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the City, were chiefly intencive to the correction of those, that had misbehaved themselves in this present warre. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus, who after the battell at Canna, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been no better than lost. After him they took in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his Camp, with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whosoever had not served in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtfull only in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate,

Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serve untill the end of the Warre; under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Army beaten at Canna. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choole or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those, whose dishonest or unseemly behaviour fell not within the compais of the Law. They took also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publick Horles of service, unto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the oversight of mens lives and manners: and their censure was much revered and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick Works; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-ways, or other places that ought to be common, the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the setting out of Lands, Customes, and other publick Revenues to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding unto this Office; as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small help to conserve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors, which were always of that Order, and carefull to uphold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impoverished by Warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming, Regulus & Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of work, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and travell; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the Warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had been enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, untill the City were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as farre forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes living under Paronage, were brought into the Treasury; and there the Questor kept a Book of all that was laid out for the sustenance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilst the whole stock was used by the City. This good example of those which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad; so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Country was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians, nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yielded half so much commodity, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, wherein their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless if we consider things aright the calamities of this Warre did rather inable Rome to deal with those Enemies, whom she forthwith undertook, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Town to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the universality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State, whose dimension or stemme is small, may aptly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchy: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domestick prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say that our Age hath seen a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches, and and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it self to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alva; were it so, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as by extreme industry, and straining themselves to fill their publick Treasury, they are all grown wealthy, strong at Sea, & able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Common-weal, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the City was never in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautifull, should in all reason have been more dear unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens and Subjects of Rome could have believed their own interest to be as great, in those wars which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon so great vertue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never so many. But unto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on these fatal changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIII.

The Romans win some Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the people of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the Warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The Town of Casiline, Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garrison, and likely to have been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Nevertheless, the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to have been undertaken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted unto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Town was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearfull, and craved parlee, offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversly reported) Marcellus seizing upon a Gate, entered with his Army, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fifty of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul, who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserved Commendations, by holding his word good unto these fifty; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himself, after the Roman fashion, with some equivocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsam in Gascogne taken by the Marshall Monluc, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parlee about composition, the besieged ranne all from their severall guards, upon hasty desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discovering a part of the Walls unguarded, entered by Scalado, and put all save the Governour unto the sword. Herein that Governour of Mount Marsam committed two gross errors; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee without Pledges for assurance given and received. Some such oversight the Governour of Casiline seemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable.

able. When this Work was ended, many small Towns of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slain about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Country grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum; waiting to hear from those, that had promised to give up the Town. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thrust so many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stir. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, having wearied himself in vain with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrey, but contented himself with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and began to victuall it when Summer was but half past. It is said, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in which regard if he began his winter more timely than otherwise he required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long as they were able to travell up and down the Countrey.

About this time began great troubles in Sicily, whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speak hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique place, to employ oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his son: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his sonne rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reverence, to passe by them on horse-back, which was against the custome. But the son perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The father chearfully did so, saying, It was my mind, sonne, to make tryall, whether thou didst understand thy self to be Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who after the battell at Cannae, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Town, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend, came privily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus a pattern to all traitors; using him as Camilus and Fabritius had done those that offered their faithfull service against the Falisci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Romans, than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he should be sent to the Town of Cales, and there kept as prisoner, untill they could better resolve, what to do with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal understanding that Albinus was gone and among the Romans, took it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion to seize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might seem rather severe, than covetous, he sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be barge alive; and took all their goods unto himself. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wonne by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the town; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust foremost by the Carthaginian Garrison, when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the townsmen suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdom to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: protesting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes, and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wils. In proceesse of this discourse, the Arpine Prætor went unto the Roman Consul: and receiving his faith for security of the Town, presently presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is that Hannibal men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serve on the Romans side, it was yet covenanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman again, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Prætors: and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Prætors, an hundred & twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their service, upon no other condition, than to have their goods restored unto them, when their City should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the general hatred of the Campani towards Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoyled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Bruttians, which had yielded themselves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himself a Captain, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in foraging the Countrey, was slain by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing over that help out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to pass: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence; He contented himself with taking in some poor Towns of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accomplish their purpose, and his with. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracy, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the City. But he and his company the next day were so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome, where they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their business the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent again to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philemenes, two the chief among them, used much to goe forth of the Town on hunting by night, as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldome or never they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seem to have been abroad upon other occasion. From the camp of Hannibal, it was about three daies journey to Tarentum, if it should have marched thither with his whole Army. This caused his long abode in one place the less to be suspected: as also to make his enemies the more secure. He caused it to be given out, that he was sick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their business in order; He took with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before break of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourscore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for fear lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discovered. It had been often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, took it for a sign, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gave order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their booty, and send them gone. But when it grew dark night, Hannibal guided by Philemenes, came close to the town: where according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to shew his arrivall, Nico, that was within the town, answered him with another light, in sign that he was ready. Presently Nico began to set upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philemenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called up the Porter, bidding him make hast, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heavy, that scarce two men could stand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket, and forthwith forthwith entered two young men, laden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood on doring at the largeness of the beast, Philemenes ran him through with his Bore-spear: and letting in some thirty armed men, fell upon all the watch; whom when he had slain, he entered the great gate. So the Army of Hannibal entering Tarentum at two Gates went directly toward the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their General, and sent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be the guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. or better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheer. All the Town was in an uproar: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unskillfully sounded by a Greek in the Theater: which helped the suspicion, bon of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoil the Town; and of the Roman, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal assembling the Tarentines, gave them to understand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressours; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done, and having gotten such spoil as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town, he addressed himself against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery falling forth, gave charge upon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawn on as many as they could, and so far from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a sign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drave him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood up on a Demi-Iland, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall against the Town, wherunto it was joyned by a cawley. This cawley Hannibal intended to fortifie in likelike against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themselves from all danger thence. His work in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the piece it self, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilst he was busied in his works, there came by sea a strong supply from Metapontium: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counsell. Now so far as much as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not pass forth, whilst the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely that the Town would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilst the Roman garrison by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Town standing in plain ground, and their streets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he undertook, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwise busied, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutuall loss on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great City of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hasty growth from that want of men, and of all necessities, wherinto the losse at Canna had reduced them. But to fill up these Legions, they were faine to take up young Boyes that were under seventeen years of age: and to send Commissioners above fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appear serviceable, and pressing them to the Wars, making yet a Law, that their years of service, wherinto they were bound by order of the City, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning to young, as if they had been of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campanians felt great want of victuall, as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoil, which the Romans had in fore going years made upon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to be shortly. He gave them comfortable words, and set Hanno with an Army to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day, against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victuall, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he used great quantity of grain, that had been laid up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time 10 appointed, came no more than forty Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horses, as if this had been nought to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlessness of the Campanians. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts, since hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day; again which he made provision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad 20 to make provisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their Camp; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set upon a great harvest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to assail the enemies camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that he was there with the first break of day. By coming so unexpected, he had well near forced the camp on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the less desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he laid, that it were better to go more leisurely and substantially to work; to send for his fellow-Consul, with the rest of their Army; and to lye between Hanno 30 and home; that neither the Campanians should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound the retreat; he saw that some of his men had gotten over the enemies Rampart. There was great booty, or (which was all one to the Souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore some Ensign-bearers threw their Ensigns over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unless they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Fear of such ignominie, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers adventure so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the 40 camp was wonne: in which were slain above sixe thousand; and taken above seven thousand, besides all the store of victuall, and carriages, with abundance of booty; that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pitefull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the love that he was wont to protest into their City; and how he had made shew to affect it no less than Carthage. But now, they said it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoil, whilst he himself was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many Towns adjoining, to yeeld unto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eastern part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Græcia. These people took to heart the death of their Hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them to defend the Citadell of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like; upon the like reason, had not some companies lye in their Town;

Town; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Nevertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their service to Atinius the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed up their gates. A little formality they used in pretending fear, lest the enemy should break in together with the Romans, in saving Atinius himself, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chief men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian or no. But this disposition lasted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; 10 and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves to the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Consul, was slain, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himself, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the 20 great hinderance of that business. The Volones or Slaves lately manumitted, forsook their Ensigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, & drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hostility, which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; in somuch, that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went severall waies: Fulvius towards Canne, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetcht a com- 30 passe about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, a stout man, & one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were unwilling in such a time, to reject the virtue of any good Souldier, how mean soever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thousand: and he himself being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up so many volunteers, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a stout Centurion, and one able to command in 40 chief. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slain, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius a Roman Prætor with eighteen thousand men was in Apulia, very careless, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he hasted to visit him: hoping to deal the better with the main strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about, under men of small ability. Comming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fulvius, he soon had him in the trap: whence 50 he made him glad to escape alive; leaving all, save two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, received the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Nevertheless, all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should go substantially forwards with the siege of Capua: which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sat down before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Suessula, to their assistance. They made Proclamation, that whosoever would issue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their own strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed up, they sent messengers to the Carthaginian, which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long journey in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, upon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them consider, how a few days since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither again, and send the Romans going as fast as before. With this good answer 10 the Messengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City, which the Romans had almost intrenched round. As for Hannibal himself, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendship, would hold out a long time, and thereby give him leisure to do what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Eastern parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it self in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered, & thereby gave the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst he himself pursued hopes that never found success.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua, retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The Town-men often sallied out; rather in a bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans used to thrust out some troops, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercises the Capuans usually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore devised, that some active and courageous young men should learn to ride behinde the Roman men at arms; leaping up, and again dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Felites, having each of them three or four small darts: which alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick upon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kind of service, they much disheartened in the main. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans; and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, tell upon their Camp. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of unserviceable people by the walls, which with a loud noise of Pans and Balons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himself to the *Campan*s, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he drove them at length back into their City. Nevertheless, in pursuing them to their gates, He received a wound that accompanied him in short space after to his grave. Q. Fulvius held harder to his task by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman camp was even at point to have been lost; and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slain upon it, fell into the ditches, & filled it up in such sort, that their bodies served as a bridge unto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitives that could speak Latine well, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himself, and flie betimes unto the next hills, for as much as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serve. The fraud was detected; and the Army having sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it self, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it self: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-near lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himself and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater use: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, even to set upon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of Warre that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a mean, to draw the Roman Generals, or 10

one of them at least, unto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the *Campan*s, should well enough deal with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his coming might (to astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His only fear was, left the *Campan*s, being ignorant of his purpose, should think he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Numidian: who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himself thence over the innermost Trenches into the City. The journey to 10 Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good success resting in the suddenesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to have in a readinesse ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Army over the River Fulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals, by some fugitives, had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diversity of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counsell to let alone Capua, yea, and all places else, rather then to put the Town of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so far from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, should judge himself strong enough 20 to win Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serve the turn well enough, to keep him out and fend him thence, if he were so unwise as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius & Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred unto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoovefull: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, 30 Q. Fulvius took fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Army: with which he hastened toward Rome, leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal having passed over Fulturnus, burnt up all his boats; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hastened he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down by the people of Fregella: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, while the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him: driving the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round 40 about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the City; some few bringing true advertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the streets and Temples in Rome were pestered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their hair, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hastning to the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconsull did expire, at his returne home; and entry into the Gates of Rome. 50 Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the City in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should have equal power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in passing over Fulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so took they more carefull and especial order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Town; whence he advanced with two thousand horse, D d d d d 2 and and rode along a great way under the Walls, viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without peril. Of Numidians that had shifted aside, and fallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Town, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their service might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed 10 not from the followers of Hannibal, bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproar among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cattell, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stopp'd up: and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the house tops, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all 20 which had been Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should have authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed over Anien, and presented battell to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertook it. It is said, that a terrible shewre of rain, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to return into their severall Camps: and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking up and clearing as soon as they were departed asunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not indure to stay there, untill his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well advised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great so ever it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soon abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time the supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipios, were sent out of the Town, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation: it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such as men have fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great fear of they wilt not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him that could tell who had sent the Assie into the Camp. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seem to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that fear, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This indignity comming to his ear, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made 50 port-sale of the Silver-smithes shops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his own title to the houses within the Town were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceived; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had propoos'd unto himself, this journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what spoil spoil he could of the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest over the Country, and ran toward the Eastern Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the City of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost: and is likely to have cur'd the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that fair City, since he had no other way to vent his grief.

Q. Fabius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation a new, that whoso would yeeld, before a certain day, might safely do it: This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they 10 were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his own evil desires, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bosfar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Town, that Hannibal should come again; if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto him as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by some Numidians: who running as fugitives, out of the Town into the Roman camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packers. But it hapned ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Bosfar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not 30 thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make Warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, wheresoever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannae. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate sally, if he would once more adventure to set upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Bosfar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now began to faint under the burden of that Warre, wherein as afterward he protested he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had been sent over by the Hannoniens, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands, who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble and consult, about the yeelding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators and such as a few years since, had been most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheer, he would drink to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies sought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were; that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together, by drinking poison. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereat a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entering, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman camp. At their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons upon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody; some to Cales, others to Theorum. Touching the generall multitude, they were reserved unto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Capuans; as having loved them well in former times, & having given his daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom we spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance: for fear, left upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoovefull to the common safety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the pains to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all towns of Italy the less apt to follow the vain hope of the *Campan*s: and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Astellans, Calatines and Sabatines, people of the *Campan*s, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear and want of ability to resist. They were therefore used with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young gentlemen burning with fire of revenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire to many houses, that a great part of the City was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discover who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the *Campan*s being detected by a slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the sum of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to their delicts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators, resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certain day, and confined unto several places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beaury and commodious site: but no corporation or form of polity was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Provost was every year sent to govern over those that should inhabit it, and to do justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present war. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his oil being far spent; and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicily, held War against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

Whilest things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicily by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: above thirty thousand being up in arms, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harfcoras with his son Hyefus, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so careless, as in the rest of their main undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had been better if their care had been directed unto the prosecution of that main business in Italy; where, in this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindered the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harfcoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Quintus Mutilus the Prætor: who lay sick in the Province, and not more weak in his own body, than in his train. But whilest they sought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiring those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enter-enterprise was such, as may seem to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent over Asdrubal, surnamed the Bold, with a competent fleet and Army, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neer kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was cast upon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such evil plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custom of the Romans, to preserve and uphold in their several provinces, the greatness and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had been first subdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron; the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most ready and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very fine intelligence, in every Province, and had always in readines fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far out. Yet was Harfcoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we have spoken before: he landed at Calariis, or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Countrey, and sought out the Enemy. Hyefus, the sonne of Harfcoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battell to the Romans at his own discretion. So he rashly ventured to fight with an old Souldier; by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day above thirty thousand of his followers. Hyefus himself, with the rest of his broken troups, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soon after this defeat came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians; too late to win all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage: yet soon enough, and strong enough to save the Town of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himself back to Calariis: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance, their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians; and the rebels, with whom they had refused to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calariis: where, if he had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would have sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appears to have been greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in few skirmishes, Manlius adventured all to the hazard of a battell; wherein he slew twelve thousand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four hours the battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans; by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had been broken in their unprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of young Hyefus, and of his father Harfcoras, that slew himself for grief, together with the captivity of Asdrubal himself, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Army fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space won the Town. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yielded unto the Roman, who imposing upon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their severall offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calariis with a great booty, and from thence to Rome leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The war in Sicily was of greater length, and every way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victory brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not only saviors of their own, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after after the battell of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this present war. He left his kingdom to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo his sonne, that should have been his heir, being dead before. To this young King his successour, Hiero appointed fifteen tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdom, by the same art, whereby himself had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of so many coadjutors, began to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and said, that he was able to rule the kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe in a fort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of government, gave himself wholly over to his pleasures; or, if he had any regard of his Royall dignity, it was only in matter of exterior shew; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never seen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, suitable to his outward pompe, he gave proof, that in course of life, he would revive the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant, many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it self. Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsellors, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoever they agreed in other points; were at some dissension about the main point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleasure, which was set on change: but Thraso, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amity with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtful which way the King would incline, a conspiracy against his person was detected by a Groome of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speak any thing: but yielding (as it seemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confessed, that he had been set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were near in love or place unto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and never shrunk for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremity. Thus they all escaped, and soon after found means to execute their purpose. The King himself, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved upon siding with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, love to seem wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the Liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessity, had of late been such, as might have been termed excessive; were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he took order for his own Estate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers farre off, regarded only the things present; the weakness of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vain, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his messengers were dismissed with an open scoff. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himself; saying, that he could hardly believe the Carthaginians;

so wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reign over all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied with what they could get in Italy. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stir: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertain more quarrels, than were enforced upon them by necessity; and partly (as may seem) for that the reputation, both of himself, and of his City, had received such blemish, by that which hapned unto him in his journey, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicily, and forbade him to look big. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their necessity, this Appius was to carry back unto him: it being refused by the Roman Senat, with greater bravery than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the money with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been noised abroad, that he should do: the war against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vain-glory, and send word after him, that he should consign that money over to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwise wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimity, into such a pitifull tune of thank-giving, as mult needs have bred sorrow and commiseration in so true a friend as Hiero, or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of pastime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of war, than well resolved how to begin it: his own death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the state of Syracuse, which thereby might have prospered more than ever, had it been wisely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men, to solicit the Towns, and persuade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himself with an Army of fifteen thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a City of his own Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Sovereign. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden, as he was passing through a narrow street: and rushing between him and his guard, strook him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Masters death. Yet, for fear of the worst, a great largesse was promised unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcase to lie unburied. These news ran quickly to Syracuse; whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signify all that had passed, to stirre up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his followers would make offer to usurp a tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon presently took armes, and made themselves masters of their own City. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island; being yet uncertain what to do: between desire of making himself a sovereign Lord, and fear of suffering punishment as a Tyrant, if his enterprise mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cheished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well-known Proverb, which Demetrius had used; That a Tyrant should keep his place, till he were haled out of it by the heels, and not ride away from it on horse-back. But fear, and better counsell, prevailed so far, that Andronodorus, having slept upon the matter, dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech unto the people; telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaved themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in fear, lest they would not have contained themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to ravish their liberty perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever, he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered up the charge committed unto him, by one that had bin an evill master both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors chosen (as in former times) to govern the City, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But such was his desire of Sovereignty; and so vehement were the insigations of his wife, that shortly he began to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captains of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himself strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had been with the Syracusian Prætors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to instructions of their Captain, had done him, whilst he lived, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to return home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed, and witha convey, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted, both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the business for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated t themselves into the bosomes of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia, the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part, as being carryed with the like passions of his own, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slain out of hand: and afterward accused to the people, of all the evill which they had done, whilst Hieronymus lived, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this dangerous treason: and that the unquiet spirits of these women would never cease to work, untill they had recovered those royall ornaments and Sovereign power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die, and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heavy sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sosippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassadour to King Ptolemy, &c. he durst not return home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude, that (pardoning themselves) all cried out upon the Authors of so foule a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger, they called for an election of new prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slain: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusians and the Romans. But having striven in vain, and seeing that the people stood in fear of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus that was lately come into Sicily, they gave way unto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be re-confirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by such fugitives, and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly & boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word unto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the

the league; and that the peace would never be kept sincerely, untill this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustain the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the war, than to excuse any breach of peace, went himself unto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late served one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their Treets the Tyrant was slain, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should bear Dominion over those that had broken the Chain, withal both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that such their arrogance should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals unto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due; Epicides told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it unreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been subdued by the same hand, which took liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded unto Syracuse, and been subjected unto that City, by what forme soever it was governed; this claim of liberty was rather seasonable, than just. Nevertheless, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: inso much that when messengers came soon after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargains for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing justice upon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forthwith took the business in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault Leontium was taken, all save the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled: and stealing thence away by night, conveyed themselves into the towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains used after victory, to seek out the fugitive Roman slaves and renegado's, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Town's-men and Souldiers, he took to mercy, forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary sort. It was said, that he had slain Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Town to sack. These newes met the Syracusian Army upon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his business before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had been sent forth of Syracuse, under Sosis and Dionemus, two of the Prætors, to serve against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had been so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny, though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best, to turne their unquiet thoughts another way, and set them awork in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their service. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischief, devising what further harme they might do; but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed unable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hercof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus unarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Crete were in the vanguard; that that had been well used by Hieronymus: and some of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian war, and lovingly dismissed them. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheer, saying, That no man should do them harme, as long as they could use their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident ran swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by severity, which would not serve. For when they commanded these two traitors to be laid in Irons, the exclamation was so violent against them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what course to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates devised a trick, whereby to help himself, and better the uncertain case wherein he stood. He caused Letters, of his own penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trusty Cretians, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines: but that it further behoved him, to make like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse, which were offensive, all the like in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the uproar was such, that Sofis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forsake the Camp, and flee for their lives. All the Syracusians remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saved their lives, rather to keep them as pledges, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischievous knave, that had served amongst the Leontines, to justify the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witness. This incensed not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole town with causelesse indignation. In good time (said some) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would have dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whilest they were thus discouraging, and devising how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unless for want of help, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the best and wisest of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the Town, that laboured to break it open. So he entered, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers untill night. The next day he went openly to work: and, after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all slaves and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himself and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadours to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he near with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a half of the Town, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the wals by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Town, might be suffered to returne and enjoy their own; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, that if their errand had been to him, he could have told what to say to them: but since it was directed unto others, they should doe well to return, when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the war which they threatened, he told them, they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he sent them gone; and returned back into the City. Immediately began the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neverthel, ffe all his labour was disappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill success of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the City, that bred such despair of hasty victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuse Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of War, as being in this extremity put in use, did more mischief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gun-powder; had they in that age been knowne. This Archimedes discouraging once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proof of this bold assertion, he performed some strange works; which made the King entreat him to convert his study unto things of use: that might preserve the City from danger of enemies. To such Mechanical works, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberrall sciences, to submisclearned Propositions, unto the workmanship, and gain, of base handy-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians, so that seemed unto him to proplane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly task a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were published: and being once made known, to be under-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit; and things that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discovery, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proof. He that looks upon our English Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will think it ridiculous to hear one say, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophy. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the less, for that the labour of workmanship grows to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handy-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books, which being devised, and bettered, by great scholars and wise men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily over, and feed their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others that have, or would seem to have any secret skill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankind: are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of injustice, that the long travels of an understanding brain, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away upon men of no worth; yeld less benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Envie have in it any thing allowable and naturall, as having Anger, Fear, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serveth against those, which would usurp the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Nevertheless, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every own ought to bear unto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his sunne so shine upon the just, and unjust: it will appear more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish unto the world, those good things that lye buried in their own bosomes. This ought specially to be done, so when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evil men to a mischievous use. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giving some deadly and irrecoverable poison: much better it were, that such a Jewell remain close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to use the remedy, by teaching the worst men how to do mischief. But the works which Archimedes published, were such as tended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, serving unto the defence of Syracuse, not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to use them, but reserved so much to his own direction; that after his death more of the same kind were not made, nor those of his own making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done especial benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certain of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wal. Against these Archimedes had sundry devices, of which any one fort might have repelled the assailants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He shot heavy stones & long pieces of timber, like unto the yards of ships, which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come nearer the wals, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoisted up, shaking out all the men, and afterwards falling down into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted up into the ayre, where turning round a while, they were broken against the wals or cast upon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten that they durst never come to any second assault. In the like fort was the Land army handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like hail, did not only overwhelm the men, but brake down the Roman engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the assault. For the remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get near unto the wals, they should be (as it were) 20 under the point blank, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments, which were wound up hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vain hope cost many of the assailants lives: For the shot came down right upon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled (for they were unable to tarry by it) even till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the wals, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were ready to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that fear, against the cause whereof he knew no remedy. If the engines had stood upon the wals, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without, he might have holpen it by some device, to make them unserviceable. But all, or the most of them were out of fight, being erected in the streets behind the wals, where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left than to cut off from the Town all provision of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate piece of work. For the enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely so soon to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the mean while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there to dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make war upon the Comans in Sicily by Land. He took many Towns; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians, did yield unto him. To remedy this mischief and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Army, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He took Pelorus and Herbessus, which yielded unto him. He took also Megara by force and sackt it: 50 either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poor, and his Army must have somewhat to keep it in heart. His especial desire was to have saved Agirgentum: whether he came too late; or Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse, carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The consideration that he used, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had not mist. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his brother, had lately issued out of the City, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, horse, intending to joyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus tell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victory against the disperfed and half unarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ranne over all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battail to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entered with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the City. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so again, that although another Legion was come from Rome; which escaped from Himilco, and lately arrived at Marcellus his Campe: 10 yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians, and flew or betrayed the Roman Garri-sons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving some of his Army before Syracuse, that he might not seem to have given over the siege, went unto Leontium, where he lay intensive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turn all his forces to Agirgentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as unable to prevail: and he himself was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feasible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He 10 came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before, and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assayed to prevail by reason, against which no place can hold out. And to this end, he dealt with the Syracusan Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easie for them to do, because the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave unto one of these banished men, making them to runge away from his Master, got into Syracuse, where he talked in private with some few, as he had been instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conspirators ased 30 to send him advertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were grown to the number of fourscore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they like Traitors, put to death. In the mean while, one Damagippus a Lacedemonian, that had been sent out of the Town as an Embassadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the wals. There, one of the Romans, looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometry, fell to numbring the stones: and making an estimate of the height, judged it less than it had been formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice 40 to be taken of the place, and finding that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all thing ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Town, and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprize. But a fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great feast was to be held unto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheer was not so plentiful within the City, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the people, had made the more large distribution of wine. A better opportunity could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus in the dead of the Festivall night, came unto the wals, which he took by Scalado. Syracuse was divided into four parts (or five, if Epipole were reckoned as one) each 50 of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some pieces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of booty, and better opportunity than before, to deal with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina & the Island, inner parts of the Town, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, unto those that were sheltered under strong houses: although it may seem, that the inner wals were not altogether unfurnished of his help; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegado's, were more careful than ever to defend the rest of the City: being sure to be rewarded with cruel death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicles sallied out of *Acra*dia upon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assaults were repelled. Nevertheless, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as tightly besieged, as he himself did besiege the Town. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat less) afflicted with the same pestilence, inasmuch that Bomilcar did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to do his Country service: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid, being loth to double the Cape, for that the winds did better serve the enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicles out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the City; and to draw him on. With much interyal length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, he stood off into the deep, and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Thence did not Epicles return unto Syracuse, but went to Agri-genium: where he expected the issue, with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as near as they could safely, unto Marcellus, and some of them, in a strong town three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicil was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Town. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave ear: for he had stayed there long enough; and had cause to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong again. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens; and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper laws; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicles had left his charge, were put to death; new Rectors chosen; and the gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their own condition to be desperate, persuading the other Mercenary Souldiers; That the Citizens had bargained only for themselves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they presently took Armes, and fell upon the new chosen Rectors; whom they slew, and made election of six Captains that should command over all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers, excepting only the fugitives. The Treaty was therefore again set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delayed; either by some fear of the Citizens, that had seen (as they thought) proof of the Roman avarice in the sack of Epipola, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might use the liberty of a Conqueror, & make it wholly subject to Rome. Mertius a Spaniard was one of the six Captains that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercenaries, holding his own particular benefit above all other respects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument of the same Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This crafty Agent perswaded Mertius, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if ever he purposed to make his own fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where else; it was now the only time to do it, by conforming himself to the will of the Roman General. By such hopes the Spanish Captain was easily won, and sent forth his own brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been such, as deserved not to be required with the ruine of his Country: much less, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister unto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poor Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired Souldiers; and therefore were fain to yield unto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronimus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicles: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately slain many the principals of Epicles his followers; and many of themselves had also been slain, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascality, and some ill advised persons, joyed with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their own City which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman General, in a treaty of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain under-hand against them, with a Captain of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his return home: but the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, and promise of good usage in time to come, than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, so great, wealthy, strong, and many ways important. Nevertheless if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefs wherewith Syracuse was obnoxious; both by evil neighbours, and by that very form of policy, after which it was governed: we may truly affirm, That it received no small benefit, by becoming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all forraign enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their liberty in vain. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happiness, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; wherewith by Marcellus his victory it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable: unless we should approve the answer of that Thief, who being found to have stolen a silver cup from a sick man, said, Hee never leaves drinking.

By the treason of Mertius, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to have been no less, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it self; that maintained war by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marvellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched; save only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicles, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himself. He was so busie about his Geometry, in drawing figures, that he hearkened not to the noyse, and uproar in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tomb (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which he first found out. An invention of so little use, as this may seem, pleased that great Artist better, than the devising of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would think the money lost, that had been spent upon a son, whose studies in the University had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Towns in Sicil yielded unto the Romans, except Agri-genium and a few places thereabout. At Agri-genium lay Epicles with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good pieces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his own name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicles adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town, and not behave themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was he more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and again he let upon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred envie in Epicles & Hanno: especially in Hanno, that that having been lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himself wronged greatly by Hannibal, in that he had sent unto him this Mutines, to be his companion, and to take upon him, like as good a man as himself. The indignity seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside unto Heraclæa, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians, advised (as directing Hanno and Epides) not to meddle with the enemy, untill his return. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell unto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behinde in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the odds 10 between the Captains. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of war. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclæa, were much more offended, when they saw that the vain-glorious envie of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a foolish desire to get victory, without the help of Mutines their Countryman. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but only look on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten by whom they had been misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily 20 set upon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them back into Aggrigentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himself, and not have hazarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province; and soon upon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foot, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, took it very hainously, that no good service done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent far from home, and not suffered to return back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his countremen the Numidians, & like an honest man, did what he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno, finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Prætor, used all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those In-land Towns that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from over-running all the Country; yet he hindered the Country from revolting unto Mutines. Above threescore Towns, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which Aggrigentum was the principal, and far bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in delight of the Romans: not only to the succour of his own adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with envie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have share in the honour of these Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected, that should have been regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Assistant, or Director: He took away from Mutines his charge, 30 and gave it to his own sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spitefull dealing occasioned the losse of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Countryman, being such a brave commander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his own disposition. M. Valerius Levinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook 40 this these indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that City, which was likely to perish by the evill counsell that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Countrymen had lately done, content himself to see his Adversaries reap the bitter fruits of their owne malicious over-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conspired against them to deliver up Aggrigentum, and to help to expell them utterly out of Sicily. The Consul was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his advgements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize upon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay near in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had been no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betook himself to flight: and saving himself, with Epides, in a small Bark, set sail for Africk; leaving all his Army and Adherents in Sicily, to the mercy of the Romans, that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Levinus the Consul having taken Aggrigentum, did sharp execution of justice upon all 10 the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the money that was raised of the booty. This was indeed a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of Steele: which may have been the reason, why Levinus dealt so cruelly with the Aggrigentines. Nevertheless the fame of such severity bred a terror among all the Dependents of the Carthaginians, so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About forty Towns yielded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treason; and sixe only stayed to be wonne by force. These things done, Levinus returned home to Rome, carrying with him about four thousand men from Aggrigentum; that were a 20 company of out-laws, bankrupts, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoile of others in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their own occupation against the Brutians; a theevish kinde of people, that were enemies unto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipios in their journey against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall service. So by this enterprise of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the war passed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy from the taking of Capua to the great victory at Metaurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good services done in the Iland of Sicily, he had granted unto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leave his Army behinde him in the Province. He stayed not long in Rome, before he was again chosen Consul 30 together with M. Valerius Levinus, who succeeded him in the government of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making war against King Philip in Greece. Great Complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done unto them: they alleging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to be moan themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessity; and not unto 40 the the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controversy, as best agreed with the benefit of their own Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath been shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Lavinus, were appointed to make war, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicily. The Isle of Sicily fell unto Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not seem hindred by fear, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his business with them was dispatcht, he gently undertook the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family, to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicily, whose doing there have been already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the war, and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Navie. They were all of the poorer sort, that used to be employed in Sea-services, especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there money enough in the Treasury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of private men; who in this necessity of the State, were driven to sustain all publick charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter unto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could undergoe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty have been imposed upon it. Nevertheless it was impossible to maintain the war against the Carthaginians, or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That since the common Treasury was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no persuasions would be so effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was that the people also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasury, all the money that he had; and that no Senator should keep any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoever; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings unto the gods; as also a Ring for himself, with such other tokens of ingenuity for his wife and children, as every one did use, and those of as small value as might be. This advice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publick necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wrack, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimity deserved well that greatness of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal; & Lavinus toward Sicily. The Army of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seem to remember him, and think upon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the loss of Capua; which gave them cause to look unto themselves; as if in his help there were little trust to be repofed, when they should stand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Towns that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his Army, that he should not be able to keep the field: or else he must leave them to their own fidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealousy grew so outrageous, that he sacked and wasted those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himself; and make unprofitable to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The town of Salapia yeelded unto Marcellus; and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater loss, than the Town it self. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dafius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafius in private: and was by him accused unto Hannibal. But when he was convicted and charged of Treason, he so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meer malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his adversary anew, and urge him from time to time, with such lively reasons; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul took by force, Aronea and Miles, Towns of the Samnites, wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal's men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once; but was fain to catch advantages; where he might get them; the Romans now being grown stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speed in many petty enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italy, to follow business of far less importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had been so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season, Rome it self might have been stricken down, the next year after that great blow received at Cannæ. But since that which is past cannot be amended, Hannibal must force himself to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty succour would come time enough. For Masinissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set sail for Spain, whither when he came, it was appointed that Masinissa should forthwith take his journey into Italy, of which there had been so much talk. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal & his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; the Romans to prevent the threatening mischief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor lay near unto Herdonea to get the Town by practise. It was not long since, near unto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; & came to Herdonea ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As soon as he came, he offered battail to the Roman Prætor; who accepted it with more haste than good speed. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himself, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were slain, the number is uncertain, some reporting seven, others thirteen thousand. The Town of Herdonea, because it was at point to have yeelded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire; and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude, whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate; and exhorted them to be of good cheer, for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian space; and overtaking him at Numistro in the Country of the Lucians, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted untill night, & ended, by reason of the darkness, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and fought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battail, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus passed the time away, untill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius considering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that year to besiege Tarentum: which if he could win, like it was, that scarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served under him the year before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to help Tarentum.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himself, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannusum, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battail, but upon equal termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong untill the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be lusty, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captain, that would never suffer them to be at quiet; untill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battail; wherein Hannibal had the victory; took sixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of Marcellus. Marcellus was so in patient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pefants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these and many other like words, which they were ashamed to hear, he did so vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such disfigurement of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be careful, to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight again; since all other motives continued the same, and his men had been heartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of revenge, and of repairing their honour lost, which affections gave a sharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battail Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so dear a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slain, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battail, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal, who dislodged by night. Nevertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consull hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consull about the same time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscientes, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns: whom Fulvius entertained in loving sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had been authors, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian thieves, which Levinus had lately brought from Agaturna, was then also set on work to besiege Caunonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serve to divert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consull, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salentines, sat down before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed thereby by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof the gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Consull acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in love, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistress, to doe what she would have him. The Consull hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to convey himself into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own persuasions, partly by the flattering entreaty of his sister, wanne him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the businesse, and resolved how to order it, the same souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consull with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutians kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of his hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consull. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consull, to the end that he might seem to have wonne the Town by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit & posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caunonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so near, that they were faine to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this businesse was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibals, we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consull; he incamped a few dayes together, so near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two young men of the same city; who did their errand so well, that the Consull wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the wary Fabius. But whereere some secret notice of the plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two messengers were employed again: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where, save only at Caunonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seem good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common poverty, and disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered; that the Legions of Cannae, and those unhappy Companies that had been beaten under the one and the other Ch. Fulvius, were transported into Sicily, where they lived, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhausted with levies of men, and impositions of money: in every of which years they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could fear; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to pass within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new souldiers were dayly pressed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never returned. Such talk was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Surium, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of twelve, That they should boldly deny unto the Romans their farther help. This was thought the likeliest way to obtain peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Towns make such declaration, and protest their disability of giving any farther help: they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campanians or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-City. But all would not serve, the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteen Colonies did not imitate these twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergo whatsoever should be layed upon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls, that the Embassadors of those faithful Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good services, this their present love unto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed upon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best, neither to retain them in the City, nor yet to dissmise them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their own consideration of their ill deserving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought in those that were so willing to help the State, if Asdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their own defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate success. Nevertheless, they were faine to open their most privie treasury; and thence take out the gold that had been laid up to serve them in cases of greatest extremity. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie success at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal, neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Nevertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at less warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiss to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessity of money, were driven to furnish the Army in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stock that was left: it must needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far less than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet won it: howsoever Livie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soon after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, & T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Asdrubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy untill the year following. After the great battell at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cuma and Naples, in seeking to make himself Master of a good Haven; for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposd in Philip, caused him to turn his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come; but since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a party against the Romans. The loss of Capua, Tarentum, and many other towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian towns, from hearkening to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, & the weariness of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did imbolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arentines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the year following they were devising how to break out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors, partly by terror of severe judgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wils, and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong War upon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battell they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. I therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of engines; sending for a Fleet out of Sicily to help him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieve the City: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprize, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Peonisia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Consuls daily offered battell. This great man of War had no need to stand upon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reserving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battell, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman Fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Pennisia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way between Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprize, and save their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal to waste their Army by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiscerned, might fall upon such as should straggle from the Roman camp; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground the Consuls thought it fit to remove their camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows who discovered not themselves, until they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their camp that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than forty horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregelle. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls, and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell down dead; then began every one to fluit for himself, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their camp: The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himself, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal, who might use it to his own purposes, ere that which had hapnd were well known abroad. Wherefore he sent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithall signed. This providence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he 10 willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should think needfull. The device was plain, and no lesse plain was the revengeful minde which he bare against that City; because of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their enemy in his own snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any sign of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened fair and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up 20 no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when fixe hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this stratagem, hasted away to Locri, whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Casil, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcursors, made the Romans in all counted haste, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their Camp, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus the surviving Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Common-wealth, 30 and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himself was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soon after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so near unto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men as were not only valiant, but well advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darcers, M. Marcellus, by losing himself so strangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, 40 whose temper needed the allay of a more stayed wit. The fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Consulship, M. Livius: one that had borne the same Office long before. This M. Livius had been Consul with L. Amilius Paulus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this Warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called into judgement by the people: and this Livius condemned; Amilius hardly escaping. Though it hath been once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it again: how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankfull Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battel of Canna, it was apparent, what lamentable effects the memory of their injustice wrought: when L. Amilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward igno- 50 rance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Tarentius Varro, to cast himself anew upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will so continue, to tell the people of their faults in a divers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been absent out of the city, and lived in his country Grange; still vexing himself with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Livius, being Consuls two or three years agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in discontented sort, as might appear, both both by his carelesness in apparell, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to poll his hair, and come into the Senate: where he used to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was propoed, either in short formal words, or in passing from side to side, when the house was divided. At length it hapnd, that in some businesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood up and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had been. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many brave men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather served 10 to fill up the number, than to answer to the dignity of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all beganto say; that it was great pity, so worthy and able a man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need, yet had not used in this dangerous war. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other of necessity a Plebeian: and since neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lavinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero; every one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two suter men than C. Claudius and this Marcus Livius. But Livius would not endure to hear of this. He said it was unreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should after- 20 wards be chosen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the people, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himself to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for shelter in a storme. Such unthankfulnessse, to well-deserving men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the second King of 30
Spain his dealing with the Duke of Avon. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, upon some small offence conceived, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdom often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited only; to have the ways of the Alpes thawed by warm weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans used at this time the service of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment for many 40 more, if they had known how to levie and maintain them. Of these which they had, four served in Spain, two in Scil, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italy, where need seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution; and would not be tied to the punctuall observance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not stirre out of Rome, against so mighty a power as followed Asdrubal, until he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions appointed to serve under Lucius Porcius a Prator of that year, among the Cisalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom this War against 50 Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, near unto Tarentum, under another of the Prators, be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was sent against Hannibal. Nevertheless, the Consuls, by the especial instance of Livius, did obtain, that all might be left to their own discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Country about Genoa, with their neighbour people, were in readinesse, to joyn with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would adventure no further, than he safely might. When all was ordered as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the City; each his severall way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had been, when L. Amilins Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and win the victory sometimes: but rather they stood in fear, left all diligence, wildome and valour should prove too little. For since few years had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not been slain; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst: the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyne, and make short work with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from such mighty opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreame difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever since the battell of Canna: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed a man of more sufficiency than Hannibal himself. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Army: this Asdrubal in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people, that he found in the way, descended from the Alps like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations, and the like, of which fear presented many unto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait upon their Consuls out of the Town, like a pensive train of Mourners: 20 thinking upon Marcellus and Crispinus; upon whom in the like sort they had given attendance the last year: but saw neither of them returne alive, from a lesse dangerous War. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accustomed advice to M. Livius, that he should abstain from giving, or taking battell, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, that he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victory; or by seeing the overthrow of his own unjust Citizens, satisfie himself with the joy of a great, though not an honest revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal received in Spain by Scipio, a little before he took his journey into Italy, such mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livie. Yet I think it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his History concerning that accident: Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spain; by reason of those Captains that were sent from the City of Carthage, to joyn with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus far forth Traytors, that they preferred the advantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courtes undertakings, it cannot be known: 30 by these books, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to us remaining only a few broken pieces. But by the spitefull dealing of Hanno in Sicily with Mutines, a better man of War than himself, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island: we may conceive, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischievous Partizans of Hanno, to use the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Nevertheless, Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His journey into Italy being resolved upon: he lay with part of the Army at Bitula, not far from the Mines of silver; whence he was to furnish his Expeditions. Thither came Scipio: and drave him out of his Camp, though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could, or would come to his assistance. The overthrow seems not to have 40 been so great, as it must have been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a provident man, and seeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, sent away all his money with his Elephants before him: but staid behind himself to sustain the Romans a while, untill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troupes together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed over Tagnus. Then taking unto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Gefso, that thought himself the fittest man for the administration thereof. Fain would Scipio have stopped him on his journey, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the mountains. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly is to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gante, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his money that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Army well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to winter in their Country; whilst that the passages of the Alps were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had to greatly molested Hannibal in his journey over the Alps, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he travelled thorow their Country. For these poor men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily persuaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattell; and to make spoil of that little wealth which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in process of time, they were better informed. Therefore understanding, that there were two mighty Cities, far disjoyned asunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alps did only lie in the way: they gladly consented to take their part in the fortune of the Invaders. The like affection upon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cispine Gaules. The Ligurians also joyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Country. There was no other Roman Army near, than L. Portius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Asdrubal set upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Town. But there he lost a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alps, was about to leave his wintering Camps, and go 30 forth to meet with him) to sit still a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from joyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battell to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Country of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the journey intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Town of the Lucans; he there fought unprosperously with Nero the Consul. Nevertheless, he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him, and had there again the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to return to Metapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assayed again, to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came again to Venusia, having Nero still at his heels. Thence went he over the River Aufus, to Cannusum, where he sate down, not far from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit down by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Country very well; that his brother might with little impediment, overcome the way to Cannusum: where if he could once again deal with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had 50 gotten in the same open Country. If this had so fallen out; Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to win any second victory, in the naked Campains about Canna; if such an Army as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did bear him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilst Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was comming to their succour: he was advertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted; as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Livie the Consul. Of these news Claudius Nero was no more joyfull. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head; unto that great body of an Army, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparent, that howsoever the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the present, any great calamity; yet the very continuance of so strong a war at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the sudden, yet within few years, was like to work most lamentable effects. It seemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to stay the progress of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readiness, that could do service in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed under the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himself to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth: it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Six thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore took, that were the very choice of his Army: and making shew, as if he would only step aside, to do some small piece of service near at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him with victuals, and all other necessaries for his Army. Livius the other Consul, at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within half a mile of him. In six dayes Nero had finished his journey thither; and when he drew near, sent Messengers before him, to give notice of his coming. Livie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert untill dark night, and then enter secretly into the Camp: lest the Enemy, perceiving this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsels. This was done: and a token given, that the Colonels, Captains, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him, should be lodged and entertained by men of their own fort. Their Company was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with him on the way. Nevertheless it was not needfull that the Quarter which received them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Councell of Warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for their new arrived Companies to refresh themselves a few dayes after their weary journey, before they should be drawn forth to battell. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make use of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his owne camp, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battell would not have been undertaken, without this their coming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Councell brake up, that the signe of battell should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coat over the Generals Pavilion.

Asdrubal was no less willing than the Romans to come to battell, having long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and some of their armes and horse looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long journey. Hereupon he began to withdraw his Army back into the camp: and gave order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whether the Enemies camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The camp, as hath been said was not extended: but the trumpets that sounded only once in the Quarter of L. Porcius, the Prætor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the the quarter of Livius the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the best way, to goe securely to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own forces, he had not cared hitherto, how near he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himself perhaps with over-strongly fortifying his own camp. Yet when he now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he dined secretly by night, intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to kepe himself as long as he could, from necessity of battell. But whether it were so, that his guides did steal away from him in the dark, so that he could not find the way to the Forde; or whether his carriages were too heavey, and hindred his speed: far he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horse, and stayed him from passing any further. Soon after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battell. Asdrubal, seeing himself overtaken with necessity to fight, omitted no care and circumspect on. His Gauls, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficulty, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himself with his Africans and Spaniards, his Ligurians he placed in the middle; and his Elephants he bestowed in the front of his battels. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battell. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was unto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion; that they were to fight with men desirous to have fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Livius the Consul with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans, by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the less, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Livius therefore, and Porcius found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensigns were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vain against a steep Hill, was unable to come to blowes with the Gauls, that stood opposite unto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who, seeing his own left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compel him to remain idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Livius: which having compassed, he fell upon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flank. Here began the victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal his battell: and falling upon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every side, the greatest part was slain. The Ligurians and Gauls escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants four were taken alive: the rest were slain: some by the Enemies weapons, others by their own guides, that rode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, began to waxe unruly, and rush back upon their own battels following them, the guide had in readiness a Mallet, and a Chizell, wherewith he gave them a stroke between the ears, in the joint of the neck, next unto the head, wherewith he killed the beasts upon a sudden. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the squadrons following them, is said to have been the device of Asdrubal himself, who dyed in this battell.

Great commendations are given to Asdrubal, both by Polybius and by Livie. He is said at all times, to have shewed himself worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother: to have thriven with great patience against many difficulties, whereinto he fell tell by the means of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this last battell all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he saw the losse irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting bravely, he was slain. Of the number that died with him in this battell, the report of Livie, and of Polybius do very much disagree. For Livie saith that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Roman at Cannae; that fifty six thousand of them were slain, five thousand and four hundred taken prisoners, and above four thousand Roman citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered, and set at liberty. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slain eight thousand; and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and silver. Concerning the booty, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have bin as rich as Livie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with money. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battell of Metanrus, a parallel unto that of Cannae) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian sides; & two thousand of the Roman, to have bin slain. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention; but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive, and that all the rest died in the battell. Whereby it may seem that they were all Barchines; so far as much as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their country, above their lives.

The joy of this victory was no lesse in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever since it were known in what fort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consull should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazzard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure, & either pursue him, or set upon the Army that staid behind, much weakened, and without a General? Thus did they talk; yet reserving their censure unto the successe; with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the mean time the people filled the Market-place, the Women ran to the temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsell, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates, as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske every ones help. In brief, they were all so full of melancholy, that when the first newes of victory came, there were not many that would beleve it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed, there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private business, making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to do) and attending their own affairs in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his camp, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians; and producing his African prisoners bound, sent two of them loose to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might have served well enough to certifie Hannibal of the mis-adventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seem, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weal; yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civilly, and lesse prone to the infolency of revenge. The best excale of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deep impression of fear into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himself, being over-joyed with the greatness of his prosperity. For it was the battell of Metanrus that weighed down the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this unhappy fight (besides the worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, with-drew himself into the Country of the Brutians; and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too far asunder. Where-

Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compass in the utmost corner of Italy, it being a country of much fastness, and the people exceedingly devoted to his service. In this business Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces united; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Consull tarried among the Cisalpine Gauls untill the end of summer; there to set things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leave to returne home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was, to have the honour of triumph as he well deserved. But so far as much as it was well known, what interest Nero had in the late victory: order was so given, that not only Livie with his Army should come home, but likewise Nero, though leaving his Army behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp whereof, Livie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers, because in his Province, and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Army also being present at the triumph. But Nero, that rode on horse back, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers, by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly ascribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgement of their good service. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Consulship. Neither indeed for this year; which was the thirteenth of the present war, untill the eighteenth year wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy, save only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surpris. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himself upright. And surely, very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius, whom Livie therein follows: That making war upon a People of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his own good conduct; & that leading an Army, compounded of so many sundry nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, & Greeks, which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they never fell to sedition among themselves, or against their General. But that which Livie adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Army in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and booty: since, after the death of Asdrubal, hee made no invasion upon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himself still among the poor Brutians. Where we must leave him; untill he be drawn into Africa by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman made entire conquest of Spain.

t. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levie a supply of men;

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himself into Lufitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in those parts. Mago had soon ended his business, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately been employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africa, and came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchinæ. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that son of Amilcar, whose authority had been great, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it self, against that noble race of Warriors, when it should appear, that things did prosper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set upon the Romans. So he entred into the country of the Celtiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by money, and over persuasions, he levied above nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himself in the Eastern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may seem, to the proceedings of Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, against whom, he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italy, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the Consuls. But hearing of the levie made by Hanno and Mago among the Celtiberians, he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countreimen incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neer to these Celtiberians: and falling upon them on the sudden, gave them such an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their succour, instead of heartening and re-inforcing them, became partakers of the loss. Mago saved himself with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten dayes journey brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken prisoner; though he kept himself out of the fight untill all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift, and saved most of themselves by running in to the woods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy stood, by the coming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his own Country; or was perhaps, about to send them: and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intente to the necessity and successe of his Countreimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spain; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that served under Hannibal, and those that had been sent over into Africa, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, that all which had followed Asdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his army was closed up in a straight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behove the Spaniards to conform themselves unto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italy, which gave such confidence unto Scipio; it was the more probable, because he took not this great enterprise in hand, untill the summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore used the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Army into many Garrisons, hindered the Enemy from doing any great exploit before winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, caused Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his brother L. Scipio took by assault the Town of Oringis.

Against the next years danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost; nor travell, in strengthening himself, for the tryall of his last fortune in Spain. With seventy thousand foot, four thousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I believe, that he could hardly have raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore he judged it needfull to use the help of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Uncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtful, of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Colebus, that was Lord of eight and twenty towns, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his service: he resolved to make use of those, and some few others, that might help to make a shew; and yet not be able to do any great harme, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemy; near unto whom he incamped. At his first coming, Mago and Masaniissa fell upon him; with hope to rake him unprepared, whilst he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain troupes of horse in covert: which, breaking upon them unexpected, caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betook themselves to plain flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes between the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many daies: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himself into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many dayes together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same form; and be matched on each part, with the enemies long before designed. But Scipio, when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He caused his men and horses to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to train out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: using herein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battell of Tribia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the middle. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertain the Romans; whilst he himself arranged his men, in their wonted order at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since, being over-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat unto their foot; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the enemy. But about noone he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battell of Spaniards far behind them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, save only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, levied in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed; and with much difficulty made resistance. The Carthaginians would fain have succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the Spanish battell which was coming against them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Army stood idle, untill the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he must have cast himself into the open place that lay before him between the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himself inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battell of Cannæ. Wherefore he did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In process of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lusty; when the others began to faint with travell and heat of the day.

Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly, and gave not over, till they had forced the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retreat; and afterward again, to have caused his men turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be extorted from them: neither was it easy to put fresh courage into the vanquished, led by the obstinate passion of fear, which hearkens to no persuasion. The Camp of Asdrubal had that day been taken, if a storm of rain, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some superfluous in the Romans, had not caused them to give over.

The same night Asdrubal gave no rest to his men: but caused them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the camp; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdians, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his Subjects: many followed this example; and soon after two strong Towns were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seems that the perverse fortune of this late battell, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleve the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himself, and marched away faster than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so oft to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, save only seven thousand that with Asdrubal himself recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea side, that was not farre thence, he took shipping, and set sail for Gades. When Scipio understood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to besiege their camp (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masaniissa staid in it) whilst he with the rest of the Army did what was needfull in the Country abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Masaniissa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it self; some flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they liked. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of war against the Romans: of which only Castulo had a Carthaginian garrison, consisting of such as had saved themselves by flight in the late overthrow. Hereby it seems that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that City. For this was one of the last three towns that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes bin inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and slew the poor men that escaped thither from the overthrows. Astapa was a town that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thiven by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not untill the next year) Scipio went against these, and took himself Illiturgi, and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a general slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcinius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market place: whereinto was thrown all the gold, and silver, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it under a sure guard, that should kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This provision being made, all the Inhabitants that could bear Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell upon the Roman Camp; where striving beyond their power, they were every one slain. Then was the Town forthwith set on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilst they rushed over-hastily to catch the gold and silver, which they lay lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal being beaten into the Island of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occasion.

occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Mysians, a people of the Numidians, hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings port: who landing at the same time, carryed Syphax quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith bethink himself, how to finish the war, by putting them to the like distresse in Africa. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurements; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moved to seek revenge. He had also bin beholding to P. & Cn. Scipio, that sent him over a Captain into Africa, who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon these reasons, the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the city in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africa, upon the friendship of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C. Laelius his Embassador, to deal with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did verily ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spain, easily persuaded the King to take part with those that had the better and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visit him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Here to Scipio condescended, thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far distant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinqueremes Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port at the same time with Asdrubal. This would have bin very dangerous unto him, had he bin decyred by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbore to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captains of two most powerful Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himself, by want of such Commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entered into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell between two Spanish Princes. A digression concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spain, and resting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, & Astapa, as hath been said before. The conquest of the Country being then in a manner at an end, he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull that he should trouble himself with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as Voluntaries, or were lent from their Princes, to give proof in single combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countreys. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to refer the decision of their Controversies, to tryall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orsus; Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers son: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tradition. But the father of Orsus stood lately seized of the principality: which although himself received by the death of his elder brother, yet this his son would not let it go back, but claimed to hold it as heir unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vain, to take up that quarrel; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battell, should be Umpire between them. So they had their wils: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skillfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the fool-hardiness of the younger.

Such combats have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kind of fight. We read of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Ithens, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one between Paris and Meneleus; the other between Heitor and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebreues: whereof that between David and Goliath; and others performed by some of David's Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kind appertain the fight between twelve of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren, Curatii, that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of less importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironside, and Cannius the Dane, for no less matter than the Kingdome. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the reign of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort, against the Earle of Blois, contending for the Dutchy of Brittain; there was a fight for honor of the Nations, between thirty of the Britons, and thirty English: two of which English, were Calverley, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, & did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is defended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of bravery, and of gaye de cœur, as the French term it; for honour of severall Nations; for love of Mistresses; or whatsoever else gave occasion unto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either upon accusation for life, or upon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kind, was that, of which we spake even now, between Corbis and Orsua. Unto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat upon Wager; such as were that between David and Goliath, or that between the Horatii and Curatii: in which without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Boulbrooke, Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ansley and one Catring-ton: whom Ansley charged with treason: and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort, and Henry of Essex. The like also, between a Navarrois, and one Welsh of Grimby, whom the Navarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawn and hanged. Whether our tryall by battell do determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had been due to the offender, if the accusation had been proved; I cannot affirm. But we every where find, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be overcome, He shall suffer the pains appointed for those crimes. In combats for tryall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offered to do, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten or yeeldeth, loseth only his cause, nor his life. Neither are the combats upon accusation, or tryall of right, fought in open field, as are those of bravery; but in Camp close, that is, within rails. Now this tryall by combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the fair his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his own Jurisdiction: And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And upon this custome grew the French Proverbe, which they use when as any man hath had an hard and unjust judgement; saying, That He was tryed by the Law of Lora, or Berne; ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battell that great learned man Tvo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his Letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kinde of tryall, was retrencht by S. Lewis, and Philip the fair; so that no man could decree or grant it, save the King himself. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French King, as to the Lord of Carognes, against Jaques le Gris, and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro his countymen: wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those challenges, upon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces defences par un dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did saiblement confesser le crime, silently confessed the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, upon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie unto the Emperor Charles the first, thereby to draw him to a personal combat: every petty companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giving of the Lie mortally it self; holding it a matter of no small glory, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperor Charles the first had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were known to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Tryall of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half so many Duels, as are founded upon meer private Anger, yea, or upon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these dayes, wherein every man takes unto himself a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats, the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philosophy of quarrell; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no less ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a far greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one having relation to a slave, the other to a souldier. I confess that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that most of these, who present death on the points of their words to all that give it them; use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speak and swear falsely. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworn to pay the monies & other things they borrow, do not break their word and promise as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyars by Record, by being tied in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of word or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised anything else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lyed to him to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make now-a-days? What is the vowing of their service, and of all they have, used in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid not good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and Court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wife French man, deciding therein the Apish custome of his Country) un marche & complot fait ensemble, sembler, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kind of merchandise, and complot made among them, so mock, belie, and deceiver each other; and so far now-a-days in fashion, and in use; as he that useth it not, is accounted either no grace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sins to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for somewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it self, as it hath relation to men, as it self either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgement of our own weakness. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men do rather deride petty injuries or sudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, do commonly suspect their own valour; and rather desire, that thereby the world should believe them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knows himself indeeb to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France have, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies: by whose judgement in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preserved, we may therefore as well submit our selves to the Judge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we do submit our selves in all controversies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chevalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere: was no lesse charitable than politick. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honey bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Revenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten up, of severall nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God upon supreme Governours, than the permission.

His Majesty therefore (which Henry the fourth of France also endeavoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could never do: in bearing down and extinguishing that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse happy in preventing the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outrageous vanity of Duellists.

Unto this that I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproof and vengeance proportionably; more or lesse, in their severall degrees. There is much difference between Lies of necessity upon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardize, or are uttered by false witnesses: the former sort being excusable by weakness or levity; the latter being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; & that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes do not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his own privilege, commandeth that the guiltfull murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guiltfull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, between committing presumptuously upon a man, to slay him with guile, and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cause, upon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queen Mary of England, and the Kings Majesty now reigning, have given notable testimony of their justice, upon three Noble men, who committed guiltfull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis upon the Lord of Talard: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporteur de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient lineage, and supported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall favour with the King) was one, was notwithstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Mary, 50 upon a Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very dear unto her. His Majesty, upon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himself valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guiltfully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, every age hath had too many examples. Of killing guiltfully by the pen (that I may not spake of any English Judge) the Author of the French Recherches gives unto us two notable instances: the one of des Elhars, who (saith Pasquier) fit mourir Montaigne grand Maître de France, pour contenter l'opinion celuy dont il estoit lors idolâtre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & estranglé; Who caused Montaigne great Master of France to die to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elhars worshipped as his Idol. but God permitted, that he himself was soon after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, upon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satise the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot; a man most nobly defended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of love growes old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, he charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed: The Admirall presuming upon the great good service which he had done the King in Piemont, & in the defence of Marseilles against the Emperour, gave the King other language than became him, and desired nothing so much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King (it being easie to provoke an ill disposition) gave commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings advocate, to question the Admirals life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the law) proceeding highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Judges with great cunning; with others, with so sharp threats; and with the rest, with so fair promises, as albeit nothing could be proved against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure, yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to prevail against his life. But what was the Chancellors 10 reward (the King hating fallshood in so great a Magistrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (saith Pasquier) a tout fageur de demeurer toujours en soy, & ne laisser fléchir sa conscience debans les vagues d'une imagination favorable, qui pour fin de j'en le submerger; A fair lesson to all Judges, to dwell always in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float upon the waves of imaginary favour, which in the end overwhelms them. And as for the Admirall, though it might have bin answered unto his friends, if any bewail his calamity as undeserved, That he was tried, according to his own desire, by the Laws of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings justice, surmounting all other his passions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Estate.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spain. His return to Rome, where he is chosen Consul.

The last business that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sick, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty kings, that had forsaken the Cartaginians, & followed Scipio a while before, to take arms against the Romans. They were vainly persuaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spain. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatness of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they rally fell upon the Suesetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Country. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sacro, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like d stemper. They had not reaped such profit of the Roman conquests, as might satise their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought that the time served very well, to enrich themselves with the spoyle of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greater 50 test of all, driving away their Colonels, that should have bridled their fury; they chose out of their own number two base fellows, Albinus Calenus, and Atrius Pmbor, to their Commanders. These took upon them all the Ensigns of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But whilst they were devising what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected; there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent unto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to beglad that they had no further over-over-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to do exemplary justice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in fear of what they had deserved. Therefore he caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius and Indibilis: he caused Albius and Atrius with some thirty other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; he called the Mutiniers to Assembly; and having them unarm'd as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inveighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albius and Atrius, with the other prisoners were haled to the stake; where they were whipt and beheaded, as was the Roman custom toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received every man his pay when he was sworn.

Mandonius & Indibilis continued in arms; notwithstanding that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet; but by the severity used to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them, and found them in a valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them; and sending Lulus with all his horse to fetch a compass about the hills, and charge them in rear, he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preserve themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio; and humbly craving pardon, both for himself and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, than formerly they had been.

Afterwards Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Maianissa, who secretly promised to do him all service, if the people of Rome would send him to make war in Africk. Unto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage, that letting all care of Spain alone, he should thence depart from his Fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gauls and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent unto him from Carthage; and he himself laid hold upon all that he could find in the town of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In 30 his voyage thence, he landed at Carthage; hoping to have taken it by surprise. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himself a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would not suffer him again to enter into their City. By this he foresaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magistrates forth unto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Isle and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure 40 of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succeed him therein: & himself with ten ships returned home. At his coming to Rome, he made suit for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bin granted unto no Proconsul, excepting to such, as received that dignity after a Consulship, as it were by Prorogation. But, to make amends for this repulse, the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by general voice of the city P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul, and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not, by the custom of those times, go far from the City; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cæsar, and others, who in ages following held the same office, were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being far & long 50 absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio, desiring to have the war transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so far off.

Scipio obtains leave to make war in Africk. His preparations. Of Maianissa who was joyned with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the money which he had brought out of Spain into the treasury; upon the setting forth of solemn plays, that he had vowed to make whilst he 10 was buied in his Spanish wars. This helped well to revive the memory of his victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the war, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassages avail much in the Senate; especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deservedly; saying, That they were the most happy of all their countymen, since they being present, had seen him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyful news. The Saguntine Embassadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome (though costly it were both to them and to the Romans) had well deserved. Nevertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed unto him for his Province, there 20 wanted not many, even of the principal men, that vehemently gainst him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who seems to have been troubled with that disease, which too often caused men, renowned for long approved vertue, to look aquint upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. He alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chief were, That the Treasury was unable to sustain the charges of a war in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces where they could not at pleasure be recalled unto the defence of Rome it self, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul, which would (he said) be greater in letting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harm to Africk. Neither did he for- 30 get, both to elevate the Spanish wars, as of less moment than the intended voyage against Carthage, nor withall to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having suffered Asdrubal to pass into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithstanding the good success of Scipio, (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that year a Province: which the Consul nevertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted upon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive war: especially against such as the Car- 40 thaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves, by help of money, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home; & taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise, he proposed the matter again to the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding; forasmuch as it was noised abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the people. This offended many of the ancients: who resented in this honourable man, a little spice of that arrogancy, which in following ages grew to be much hotter, in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, 50 Scipio referred himself wholly to the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicily might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to passe over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the war, by him intended upon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, continuing on the sudden from the Baleares to Genoa, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no lesse terrible invasion upon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Army of the Ligurians: for that he found them distracted with civill wars. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his

his party; and to help those whom he thought fittest for his turn, against the others. This troublesome business, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories, and made the unsteady Gauls ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aid from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is uncertain) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much displease him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartning him in his proceedings, yet some impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into Africk disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have been pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Juno Lucina, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punic and Greek letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission and carelesse; in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they find a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Camp, is said to have been the occasion of this years idleness; which fell out not much amiss for the City of Rome, that was marvellously impoverished by this war; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no losse, the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward unto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the people did for him: or rather they did it for themselves, that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councils of estate, that the buſie, or obstinate heads of a few, do carry all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their own judgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it self a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himself upon the advice of many, shall often finde himself deceived: the counsell of those many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature sorted well with the business, that fell out in the chief of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were grown old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about seven thousand Voluntarys. He had also provision from the severall Towns: Corn, Iron, Canvas for sails, Axes, Beed-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements; Fire for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Spears of all kinds: every place furnished him with that commodity, which it best could afford.

Unto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of five and forty dayes, he had both fell'd his Timber, built, and lanced twenty Trireme, and ten Quinqueme Gallies; wherewith he transported his Army into Sicily. In Sicily he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canus: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himself well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergone a heavy censure. They had served under Marcellus and Levinus, at the taking of many Cities and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and such as loved well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the War highly;

highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilest he was providing to have things in a readines for Africk, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri, (for there were two in the Town) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ranomed and rewarded. Scipio being advertised of this gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; & that Citadel was surpris'd. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their own paucity should make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Consul Scipio. The Town-men were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate: not only against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctity, was spoiled by these barbarous Thieves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate to make present amends to the goddess for this sacrilege: saying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done unto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principal offenders; whom they cast into prison, and used according to their defects: as also they restored unto Proserpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these wicked courses. By the sharp invective that Q. Fabius made, others took courage to speak what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissoluteness of his Army; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicily, neither mindfull of any service toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legats were sent over into Sicily, together with the Prætor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already employed Lalinius in Africk, rather to make discovery, than to work any other great effect of war. He took a great booty: and struck no little terror into the Carthaginians; who saw their affairs to be upon terms of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masaniſſa, he well informed himself of the state of Africk, and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyn with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masaniſſa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made under-hand with the Romans, Livie doth profile. That there was no such evident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancy, in following times, must help to prove, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian far inferior to Livie, both in worth and time) gives one reason for probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessity. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should have escaped the diligence of Livie, if it had been true: unless we should believe, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to think amiss of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things done, confirm it. Asdrubal, the son of Gelco, had a fair daughter, whom both King Syrax and Masaniſſa loved. Masaniſſa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to be his son-in-law.

When

Litt. lib. 79.

When the virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spain, and there did great service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubal's daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax, without standing to acquaint her father or Masaniissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masaniissa was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveyed himself home into his father's Kingdome. Thus far forth we may beleieve Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seems, that howsoever Sophonista, the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet since this their courtship proceeded from fear, he thought it wildeome to continue and increase the same the more fear, by making fair promises to the Romans, untill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, & the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it self, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Polibius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow, it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Masaniissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Desales the brother, not unto Masaniissa the son. But this Uncle of Masaniissa shortly dyed: and his elder sonne, who took possession of the kingdome, was vanquished, and slain in battell by a Rebel, that made himself Protector over the younger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himself against Masaniissa, whose returne he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masaniissa, that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memory of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would have been glad, that Masaniissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate, had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him, whilst his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrival, warred upon him, and over-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdome. Nevertheless Masaniissa still retained the hearts of his people; & thereby remained strong enough, to infect both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roads over all the Countrey, even as far as Hippo; and when Lalius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good successe, than could be expected from the good will of poor Masaniissa, sent an Embassage into Sicily about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himself of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not choose but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Countrey, if it were invaded. Nevertheless he promised to remain a Neuter, so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Adventurers. Left therefore the failing of this hope, should work too great a change in common opinion, He thought it the best way, to prevent all discourse, and set the war undertaken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in haste, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what he had promised, he had also sworn; and therefore should do well to make it good. Having sent them away, He called his Souldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which he intended no longer to defer. For, said he, Masaniissa hath been with Lalius: and Syphax hath newly sent to mee; greatly wondering upon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I fail their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale tales prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors: whose followers had been seen walking up and down Syracuse. And lest any thing should afterwards break out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet unto Lilybaeum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicily, to meet him there; hasted thither with his Army. At Lilybaeum he agreed with the Prætor, about the division of the Legions between them, which to leave behinde for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them down: since they were points of ordinary care, and which it is like that neither he, when he took his voyage into Spain, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set down by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, near to a fore-land then called the fair Promontorie: which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compass, I cannot precisely affirm; because it is uncertain, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masaniissa unto Scipio at his first arrivall, help to confirm the opinion of Xylandar, who thinks the fair Promontorie to have been the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficulty Masaniissa might come thither from the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soon after his arrivall, Scipio encamped before Vitea, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seem, that he landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vitea was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his dis-embarking. Neither was it so hard for Masaniissa, that roved about the Countrey with a troop of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before he had met with Lalius at Hippo: that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army and Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compass to Vitea, by Land; when he might have disembarked nearer unto it. Nevertheless it may pass as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentiful Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gave charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybaeum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for suitenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masaniissa had signified unto Lalius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to be such, as not only served to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatened a conquest of the City and whole Estate: then might he better advise them to set sail for Vitea, and make war upon the Enemies at their own doors.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captain of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the same that had lately been chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him no doubt against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invasion: entreating the one of them to give assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair unto the City, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troop of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the City to disturb his landing; and slain Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Town of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other booty, he took eight thousand prisoners; all which he conveyed aboard his Hulks or Ships of burden.

burden, and sent them back laden into Sicil. He took likewise a Town called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thousand Numidian horse: whose service being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceive the unskilfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masanissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno so far, that he drew him unto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slain. With those that fled, the Romans entered pell-mell into the town, which presently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a City of great importance, of which mention hath been formerly made, and fate down before it. Forty dayes he spent about it, assailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his engines of battery, whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-Camp, which must be well stored against the year following. Whilest thus necessity urged him to leave Vtica: and thence of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better success, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the siege. Asdrubal had made a Levie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw near unto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joining unto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio, who thereby took occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-Camp the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Navie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joining to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shoar: in the bottom of the Creek he moored his ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole camp he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the year, when it should serve him again to fight. Of cattell and other booty Masanissa had brought in great store, by driving the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corn also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his booty, as he could best spare; especially with captives to be sold for slaves. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the severe institution, which the Romans used in the discipline of war, or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew near, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be won by persuasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally unconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proof before this of his much levity. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearied himself, by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peradventure no less weary with satiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this war: he might be moved with a little entreaty to withdraw himself home into his Kingdome, and rest a Newer. But it is not unlikely, that such a friend as this King, had been highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was near at hand; as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had been invited, to make a step thither and repose himself a while: his wife Queen Sophoniba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africa, and so make an end of the war: wherewith now both Africa and Europe were disquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at the first give ear: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the innercourse of Embassadors; he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cab-bins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, used coverings of Mats and Reeds; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughs and leaves: under which they lay carelessly without their Trenches. Upon this advertisement he bethought himself, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without help of some such stratagem, he foresaw that it would be a work of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his wars when time should serve. It was a plain open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, upon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himself, to make some sudden attempt upon their Camp. To this end he sent many Embassadors, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discover all that might concern the intended surpris. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers, disguised like slaves; that wandering (as it were) idle up and down the Camp, might observe the waies and entrances, with whatsoever else was needfull. When he had learned as much as he desired: upon the sudden he sent word to Syphax, that it was vain to hold any longer Treaty, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of war; without whole approbation, all that himself could do, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his design in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very penive: as having lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to devise, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Camp, and provoke him to battail in those Plains. This if they could do, they hoped to make his Councell of war repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? Which they themselves were well able to do by land, and the Carthaginian Fleet should do by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in concept) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victory to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was grown upon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle, but made preparation out of hand, as it were to do somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same piece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, left being suspected by his own Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting upon the few, that he purposed to leave behinde him in his Camp. He caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes; that they might be ready for the journey. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Camp: all the rest of the Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seven miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to undertake himself with the one half of his army; the other half he committed to Lelius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set upon the camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the camp of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seem to have taken hold by casualty upon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and give Syphax warning to look to himself. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and softly; that Lelius & Masanissa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compass about for fear of being discovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himself, imputed unto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting half asleep; and others, that had sitten up late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly understand in what case they were, nor give any remedy to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many leaping into the Trenches for fear of the sudden mischief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell upon the enemies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masanissa, that best knew the Country, did great execution upon them: having laid all the ways, by which he forefaw that they would seek to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would serve to quench the fire. Others ran up to the Rampart: where, careless of any danger toward themselves, they stood beholding the greatness of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This 10 fell out right as Scipio would have it. He therefore lost no time: but setting upon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their camp, which in a little while he made to burn as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted only for himself, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had been taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been said, that with lesse than one half of thirty thousand men, he might at least have given some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not been only careful how to save his own fearfull head. Nevertheless 20 Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have been true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would have striven to their valour, when the Camp was once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and confusion. I shall not need to tell what a fearfull thing it was, to hear the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands, very few did escape, which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their severall wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the dark: but they were not many, as after shall appear. Surely it must needs have been 30 very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the dark of night. Wherefore Livie, who in the rest of this Relation is often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seem to have followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting up the summe. For he reckons only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to have escaped; forty thousand to have perished by sword or fire: and above six thousand to have been taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is far short of fourscore and thirteen thousand, which were in these two Camps.

Asdrubal, putting himself into the next town that was very strongly fortified, thought there to find the Romans work, until the Carthaginians at good leisure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Town; if the Town-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yield. Unto this disputation, he well forefaw, that the arrivall of Scipio would soon give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seek the Victors favour by delivering him up, he shrunk away betimes, and made all hast to Carthage. As for the town which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preserved it self from all manner of losse. The two next Towns adjoining would needs be valiant, and make countenance of war: but their strength not being answerable, they were soon taken by Scipio; who 50 abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, he returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason, when, in stead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessity enforced them to make hasty provision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Army, they might well defend defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, levying in all hast another Army; and sending Embassadours to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the son of Gefso, was employed to make new levies of men: and Queen Sophonisba went forth with Embassadours to her husband Syphax; who having gathered together as many as he could of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdome. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length she won 10 him to her own desire. And it fell out at the same time, that four thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought over to serve in Africk. Of these were made such brave reports, as if their courage, and the Armes which they used, were not to be resisted. Even the multitude within Carthage beleived these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole country of Spain had been twice conquered; first by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadours helped with a lye, saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made up an Army, consisting well near of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called, The great Fields, about five dayes journey from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving be- 20 hind him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes, after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now been time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman Fabius, and seek to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to give such directions as best pleased himself. The fourth day the Armies met in bat- tle: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having 30 their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the batrail. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustain the first charge of the Italians, or of Masanissa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even until they were all in a manner slain: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby 40 Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne Kingdome: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio having thus gotten the mastery of the field, took counsaill about the prosecution of the war. It was resolved upon as the best course, That he himself, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanissa, with his Numidians, and Lalius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his own Kingdome, where easily else he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it seems that Masanissa gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his own Kingdome, usurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse 50 concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himself. According to this order concluded, Lalius was sent away with Masanissa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the war from town to town. Many places yielded for fear; many were taken by force; and all the subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid upon them for maintenance of the war in Spain and Italy. What to doe in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Towns: neither durst they make bold to trouble their own subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheless of their their own tree will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadours should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himself was busied in the Iland Countreys. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: upon the safety whereof they said all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at unity among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Nevertheless, it was considered, that thereby they should only protract the warre; without any advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the ships at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come over into Africk, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Council was no sooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the Town: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio came to Tunes, a City in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible piece adjoining, he easily took; the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soons as he drew near. But whilst he was about there to incamp, and fortifie himself against the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceived; and stood in great fear, lest his own ships that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily laden with engines of battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for assaulting the town) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he hastened away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time, if the Carthaginians had used such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a bravado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their bravery at Sea; it should little avail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he took his ships of burden, and lashing them together with cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge over the Channell of the Haven; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and back again upon any advantage or need: but these he covered with planks, using the masts and yards of his ships instead of rafters, to joine all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge itself not be torne asunder. Scarce was this work finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Haven. The fight between them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unsteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small loss which followed. They that stood upon the Bridge were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for fear of hurting these their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw upon the masts and yards which served as arches to joyn the bridge together: then rowing

ing backwards, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first rank was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next rank of ships, that lay behind them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned hometo Carthage. Their welcome was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Lelius and Masaniissa, in their journey against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masaniissa to his Kingdom, without farther contention: the Masaniissa his subjects, joyfully receiving him, & forsaking the usurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Adrubal and Sophonibus, he prepared again for warre. But before the instigation of his beloved wife, the loss of the Masaniissa would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lelius and Masaniissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to think all alike their own, whosoever they are in possession, be the title unto some part never so unjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite, which thought that she had vomited up her own guts, when it was only the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeveth the Kingdom of the Masaniissa to be part of his entrails: Lelius and Masaniissa will shortly give him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) the King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had been converted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masaniissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this day though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortune of a battail is enough, to translate the Kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long ago sent unto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered up in haste: and few of them had seen warre before. Encamping neer unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troupes of horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: so that at length Syphax, unwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foil at their first meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Masaniissa, whose numbers were faire lesse. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their own troupes of horse, which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battail standing now more firm, than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Masaniissa likewise, and his troupes grew confident upon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to give back. Herewithall the Legions came in fight: which terrified to the Numidian horse, that they began presently to disband. Fain would Syphax have stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was cast from his horse, which received a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slain or taken the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsook the place, and fled, and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masaniissa told Lelius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian war; if presently they hastened away to Cirta the chief City of the Kingdom; whither he himself desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Laelius agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parlee: wherein by many fair promises and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to get his favour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yielded her self into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that the might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, commended her suit, that Masanissa forthwith granted it, & to make good his promise, married her himself that very day: thereby to prevent Laelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Laelius, when he came thither, took the matter hainously, so that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her unto Scipio. But being over-intreated by Masanissa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captives immediately; following shortly after himself with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the Kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field, and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship; with such o. her commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministering to every 20 one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make war upon them, unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moved him to do so; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himself, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Laelius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in publick, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him under- 30 stand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great services already done (for which he should be highly rewarded to his own contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be governed by Scipio, whom he nevertheless intreated, to think upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that she should not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called unto him a servant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes used then to have in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it unto her with this 40 message; That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her self.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, the only said; That if her husband had no better token to send unto his new wife, the must accept of this; adding, That she might have dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funeral. And herewithall he boldly drank off the poyson. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it down agreeably to that which hath been spoken before, concerning the precontract between Masanissa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after 50 the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Laelius and Masanissa upon their way thither, yielding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her own private, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse, and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage, he fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, the

was his own wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keep her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom she might appertain. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards, to make his claim unto her, wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poyson; wherewith she ended her life, before they came, that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Masanissa's love, and the ready 10 content of Sophonisba to marry with him: added not so much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cause (which Livie notes) of the sudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had been trained up, and dont them great service. Howsoever it were, Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashness, he brought him forth in presence of the Army, where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave un- 20 to him a Crown of gold, with other Royall ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of what which was past, unto the more cheerful contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile upon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserved; yet would not the Ti be have redounded unto his great benefit; neither should he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax's Dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Numerian in these wars, and sustained himself with his troupe of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might nevertheless have recovered his proper inheritance, by the love of his own subjects without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than he deserved: 30 neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia, for themselves; neither could they have with a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masseyls were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet thus liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: & the Romans themselves, in a politick sort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their saluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching upon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereto they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Perenna the son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly 40 speak more) which held some pieces of his fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, & promising by all means to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was punitius herein, and answered very gravely, That it was not their custome to give the honour of that appellation, save only unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in process of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit unto Kings, that no way depended upon them, the salutation by * that * Caesari Comiti, 50 name, though it were not accompanied with any other favour or profitthence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce, and break it.

THE Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befall their good friend Syphax; and understood that Masanissa their mortall enemy, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthagi- 50 nians mans had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the city, which were their Privie Council, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the feet of him, and of those that late in Council with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech: that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barghines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company, who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made such adoration to the Romans in their own necessity unless they themselves had expected the like, where they had had the advantage.

It was not unknown to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the city of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the war. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the wals of Carthage, though Trieste weaker City, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though he came into Africk, to make a conquest, and not Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making war, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these; That they should render up unto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegades and fugitive slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaulle: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Iland between Italy and Africk: That they should deliver up all their ships of war, save twenty, and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certain hundred thousand bulshells of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors unto the Roman Senate.

After this done, Masani was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the war had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lulius unto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open; and an holy day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their gods. Lulius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masani: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African war, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, made request for the Namidians, such as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him, who by rendering them to liberty, should do an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reign. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Masani in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King again; released his Namidians that were captives; and sent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their poverty might serve to testify their good will. Scarcely were these and Lulius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without: untill Lulius being sent for, came back from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was only to win time, and get respite for war; untill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chale the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, upon more easie conditions. Wherefore they sent an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded between them and Lulianus Catulus, at the end of the former war. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remain in force: neither had there since been any war at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head besieged and razed the Town of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like sort, without Commission, to pass the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had been so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that peace made by Lulianus, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gain time, untill they might repair the war. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lulius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybins, That the Senate received advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treaty of peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto conclusion. This may with good reason be believed, since it was not unknown, that if the war continued, all these goodly hopes must rest upon the most uncertain issue of one battel between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came back from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africk, to victuall the Roman Camp, was over-taken by foul-weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wrack, was dispersed, and driven aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybins, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out upon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their own greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than meer mockery, and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women and boyes, to be meddling in uproars: the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it was no marvel, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Asdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oars, recovered the station whereto their camp adjoynd) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the losse; and for that the Town was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors unto them, both to require satisfaction for the injury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gave the Carthaginians to understand, That Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace, upon those conditions which he had propounded. But (say they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before us, & kissed our feet after an unusuall manner of humility, co-fessing your selves to have perfidiously broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deserved such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soon forget what ye then uttered, and run headlong again into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selves too rhy to be destroyed, having only recourse unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amiss, that ye should consider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stir: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africk, and ready to give us battail: yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge have ye left unto your selves against hereafter? What gods will ye either swear by, to be believed, or call upon in your misery? What words, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth use, to move compassion? Surely ye have already wasted all your force of persuasion, and shall not again deceive us, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no marvell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves upbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the general opinion of the city, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of lumbifion, and to renounce not only their hope of the future, but all justification of matters past. And indeed it seems, that the 20 Roman Embassadours were very much delighted, in the rehearsal of that point which was yielded unto them, as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians took this in soill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence unto the men, who had used unto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) calls Hanno the Great: or by the very reverence, due unto the place of those that had uttered such liberal words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two gallies appointed for their safe convoy home; though with little intent of good unto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Africa. 30 He, whether only desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publick order to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the river Bagradas. Their Convoy having brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so took leave of them, as if they had been then in safety, since the Roman Camp was even in sight. The Embassadours took this in ill part; and so fearing any danger toward, but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell upon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose; which was to have stemmed them. They rowed hard 40 therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more banks of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slipped away, and made him over-shoot himself. Yet he gave them chase, and had well-near surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shoar over against them, and therefore adventured to runne their Vessell aground: whereby they saved their own lives, though a great part of their company were slain, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the war; that thereby they might be driven to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same fear, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, 50 would also have caused them to be better advised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treaty, had they not been given to understand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence, but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort Hannibal spent the time after the battel of Metaurus: The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversly affected by Hannibals departure.

Ever since the loss of that battel at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded unto Claudius and Livius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome 10 and slain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio, ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal, being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Consul, who followed Licinius; and Cai. Servilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Army, than to keep those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief enemy was become not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon 20 Africk, wherein they were at no small charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) should bring the War to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much fear of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gauls to raise an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians, and found them so ready to stir in his behalf, that if he could have entred their Countrey strong, it might have proved no less needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal to make speed unto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was uncertain, upon 30 which side Mago would break out. Being thus buied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insulbrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battell, wherein though his vertue shewed it self worthy of his Father and Brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull; in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking 40 unto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout: & strained themselves hard, as if at that brunt the victory should have been carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beasts being fitter for such use, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loose, than against the troups that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shower of darts, and killed four of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought up those forces, 50 which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these, Mago employed some of his Gauls, whom he had in readines for the like occasion. But the Gauls discharged their parts very ill. They were soon beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought fear upon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, He put himself in the head of his Army; and held them to well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by some of his owne

men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himself: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost: as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the loss of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Army, besides those that dyed of the Proconuls Legions, also besides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himself (by easie journeys, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repair home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it self was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and imbarqued shortly his Army, but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were delivering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet plain dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to work, by stopping the supply that should have enabled me to manage the War here. Scipio therefore shall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the heels: it is Hanno that hath wrought this noble feat, & overwhelmed the bowle of the Barchines, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readines, doubting that which after came to pass: wherein he imbarqued, besides his own men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunk back from him, and refused to do service in this expedition: of whom, such as he could take, he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no less passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Countreys to go into exile. He looked back unto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his own dullnesse, in that he had not led his Army from Canna, nor and bloudy as it was, directly unto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit he quitted the possession of Italy: wherein he had lived almost half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertain the newes of Hannibal's departure out of Italy: they would (I think) lesse earnestly have pressed the Carthaginians to send him over thither. When sure advertisement was brought unto the City; that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publickly made, for joy of such happy tydings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remain the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought unto them a great mass of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back unto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those moneys that had bin borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement laid upon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of means or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had had been wont to set out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very most of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown; though their wealth were not as yet futable to the greatness of their spirit) upon the good success of the battell at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen: and were informed that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few daies since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to revolve a thousand fearfull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no speciality of such great worth, as might promise the like success against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a rasall multitude of half skillions, that were good for nothing, being himself a fit Captain for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the son of Geso was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate, but otherwise, one that in the field was only good at saving himself by a swift retreat. But now there came an Army of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoils, not only of good Souldiers, but of brave Captains, by them slain. Such talk used the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell with many that had slain Roman Prætors, yea, and Consuls with their own hands; with many that had been first in getting over the Trenches of severall Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as ever had served in war, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vain; loseth a battell at Nidagara, and persuades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

H Annibal disembarked his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercure, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it beloveth him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the enemy; that he might furnish himself of these and the like needfull helps against the day of battell. From Leptis he pass'd on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Country gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to have in those dayes the best Horses of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Masaniissa, by their countenance and help to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that used it, prevailed with Tychæus, who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Mecetellus, (the same who had made himself Protector over Masaniissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise, that Vermina the Son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assail the places that yielded obedience to Masaniissa. This Vermina, as we find in Livy, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or at least so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his A&S: it offended them to think, that they had been so base as to make humble suit unto the Romans for peace; whilst they had such a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cause by Warre. But when as they bethought themselves of their own sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence or overweening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already won from the Romans? If, said he, these conditions had bin propounded whilst as yet ye detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eased. Only thou must think, that in like sort it concerns me in honour not to let them be gainers or savers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransom-free, all prisoners that they have of ours, to pay us five thousand talents, to deliver up their Gallies, and to deliver hostages for assurance of fair dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this by their breach of truce, their spoiling of our fleet, and their violating our embassadours? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done, then will I take advice with my counsell what answer to give you; otherwise you may even prepare for war, and blame your own selves for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his own Camp, with no other newes than war, bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battell, wherein should be decided the quarrell between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a notable march; and such as hath very seldom been found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battell at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance between them: Not far behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the void spaces between the Hastati; that so the Hastati, as was usual, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces between the first Battalions, they should not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velites, or those of the light armature that were to begin the fight, he gave direction, that when they found themselves to be overcharged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should run back through those lanes that were between the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, untill they were got behind all their own Army; thereby leaving room enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third batels, without cloying up the way between the Maniples, which he desired to keep open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing, under C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masaniissa with his Numidians. He himself riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly; using words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had achieved, since their coming into Africk. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the Warre was at an end: and that their victory in this War, should make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flee. They were far from home, yea, and far from their own standing Camp: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: unless they would live like wretched slaves under most mercilesse enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never been known to fail of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourscore, in Front

Front of his Battell. Next behind these, he made his Vanguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares, and Moors. Then followed his Battell, which was of Carthaginians & Africans, more interested in the quarrel than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers: but to help (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behind these came his Rereward, consisting of those brave Souldiers which had served him in his Italian wars; and were the only men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelius, in his own right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masaniissa. He was indeed farre too weak for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Metellus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the four thousand of Masaniissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be levied in the hast of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late been often vanquished, and accustomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make these his companions alight and serve on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Vermina the son of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteen thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse, the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay, Hannibal must be faine to comfort himself with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their several conditions: promising unto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards, threatening the Carthaginians with inevitable servitude if they lost that day: but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against far greater numbers. He bade them to look upon the Enemies, and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many as that huge Army which they had slaughtered at Cannae. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to run away. He told them, that these Legions, which they even beheld, were for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; yonder such, as for their dauntless fight out of sundry batels, could no longer be trusted to bear Armes in their own Country. As for the rest, they were young men, the sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual fear of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slain or chased. Wherefore he intreated these his old companions, upon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himself, that they would this day strive to make good their honour, and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations used the two Generals before the fight. When they drew near together, the Numidian horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of war, sounded to battell: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were always an uncertain kinde of help) those that stood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear: and ran upon their own Numidian horse, which they affrighted and disordered. Masaniissa espying this, gave charge upon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to rally themselves, drave them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoil of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces between the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed; but ran back upon the right point of their own battell, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gave to Lelius the same advantage that Masaniissa had against the Numidians; which he used in like sort. In the mean while, the batels of foot advanced, and drew near together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at that time they gave a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacity, and in quicknesse to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they took. But the Roman discipline after a while prevailed against the boisterous violence of these untrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat near after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows; and shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries, received no manner of help or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new-leaved Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers give back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to think themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battell was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way unto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Fear and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own fellows, to turne their armes with an heedlesse fury against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and slain, through their own indiscretion, by their own Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of work, that the Principes were faine to come up unto them, and help to over-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the ears among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which, hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stir one foot, to help or save these Run-aways. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his own side, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aside beyond his battell, and save themselves in the open field. The ground, over which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heaps of dead bodies and weapons; and so slippery with blood, that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Army, which he saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the main battell of the Hanniballians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the dayes work till now, seemed to have been a matter of pastime, in regard of the sharp Conflict, that was maintained between these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were also far the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh, (and perhaps the better men.) They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gave back one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground whereon he stood. So that, after a long time, it was uncertain which part had the worse: unless it may seem, that the Romans were beginning to thinke; for as much as the return of 40

lyb. lib. 15.

In this battell there dyed of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards: on the Carthaginian side, above twenty thousand; besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captain of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Livie reports, by Scipio himself. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse; and being enjoyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage, to take battell with such disadvantage, he could work no marvels. He saved himself with a few horse; and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence he was sent for to Carthage; from which he had been absent six and thirty years. At his coming into the Senate, He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadors again, and try the favour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies and an hundred Ships of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the City, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Octavius, whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Laelius away to Rome with newes of the victory, he sail from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embassadors from the City: who bearing up with the admirall Gally, began to use the pittfull gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City, and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it, he returned back to Vtica, and called back Octavius thither, with whom in person He set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the son of Syphan, was coming with an Army of more horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seems to have been both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not only bear him, but so compels him in, that he hardly escaped himself with a few; leaving fifteen thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access unto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage: whose behaviour, though it was more pittfull than it had been before, yet procured it less commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to besiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this war, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Consuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Consul who had charge of the war against 30 Hannibal at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to pass over into the Ile of Sicily (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africa, and taken from Scipio the command of the Army there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suit for the same Province of Africa: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Consul might joyn with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere he could have his Fleet, and all things in a readines for the journey, where- in no man cared to further him, Winter came on, and he was only tost at Sea with 40 foul weather; first upon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia, where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the war was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africa for his Province, That he said he would suffer nothing to pass in the Senate, until he had first his will. Much ado there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered, That if peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the war continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadors. He willed them to consider 50 what they had deserved: and in regard thereof, to thinke themselves well dealt withal; in that he was contented to leave unto them their liberty and their own Lawes, without appointing any Governour over them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africa, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, that, before he either granted them peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treaty was in dependence. Hereunto if they would yeeld, then required He, That immediately they should deliver up to the Romans all prisoners, fugitives, & renegado's; that they had of theirs; likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten; & all their Elephants. That they should make no warre at all thenceforth out of Africk, neither yet within Africk, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Towns, goods whatsoever, belonging any wise unto Malania, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restor'd unto him: That they should finde corn for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: that they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the term of fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year, and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages: such as Scipio would chosse, being none of them under fourteen years of age, nor above thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home, and reported them unto the City. They were very displeasing; and therefore one Gesco stood up to speak against them: and exhorted the people, who gave good attention, that they should not condescend unto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withall what favourable audience was given to this van Orator, by the unquiet, yet unwearlike Multitude, was bold to pull him down from his standing, by plain force. Hereat all the people murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, rose up and spake unto them, saying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the City would allow; forasmuch as he had been thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine years old, untill he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excus'd himself of the disorder, he discours'd unto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves, had the Demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice, they resolv'd to yeeld unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hard five and twenty thousand pounds weight in Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gave injunction, that they should neither in the mean while send Embassadors any whither else, nor yet dismiss any Embassadors to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsels. Ardubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadors, who related unto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arriv'd at Rome Embassadors from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finish'd; and order taken, for the provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors call'd into the Senate: who first answering unto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified unto their King, that at they found themselves griev'd; returned the blame upon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accus'd they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadors, that had lately been sent from Rome unto King Philip, arriv'd in Greece behind his fellows, and there leaving men, made war upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Country-men, that had lately serv'd Hannibal for Pay, and being taken prisoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be releas'd and deliver'd unto them. Unto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endur'd so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was fain to stay behind, to help them as I might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater, he affirm'd him to be one of the Kings Counsell, and very inward with him: one that serv'd not for money, but carry'd money with him, and four thousand men, sent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About these points, when the Macedonian Embassadors could make unto the Senate no good answer, they were willing to return, and tell their Master, That war he sought, and and war he should find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points he had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans: first, in that he had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that he had aid'd their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Eastern Countreys, help'd well the Carthaginian Embassadors in their solicitation of Peace. They appear'd a very reverend company, when they enrr'd into the Senate: and Ardubal above the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadors to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrell had been wholly on the Romans side; saying, that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the City that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsell. But if Hanno and himself might have had their wils, the Carthaginians, even at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had been victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadors: all of them entreating to have the peace ratifi'd; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diversity of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproof of Perjury, as they themselves might have laid upon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demand'd, by what gods they would swear to keep the peace hereafter: Ardubal made answer, Even by the same gods, that are so severe unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lenulus the Consul, interposing the authority of his office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto conclusion of peace; for that hereby he was like to lose the honour which he purpos'd to get by making war in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom rest'd the Sovereign Command of Rome; and by them refer'd wholly unto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, that Scipio, with ten Delegates, sent unto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, upon such Conditions as seem'd best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this favour the Carthaginian Embassadors humbly thanked the Senate; and crav'd licence, that they might visit their Count imen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranfome and carry home with them some that were their especial friends; of whom they gave in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordain'd, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would chosse, should be sent over into Africk, and be freely restor'd to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and return'd home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in commission.

At their coming into Africk, the peace was given, and accepted, without any controversy or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were deliver'd up to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's than upon the Fugitives; and upon those of the Romans, than upon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasury could have spar'd two hundred Talents for the present; yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fifty years: it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the sum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; so as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was check'd by Ardubal Hædus, and told, That it worst of all becomed him to laugh, since he had been the cause why all others did weep, He answer'd, That laughter did not alwaies proceed from joy, but sometimes from extremity of indignation: Yet, said He, My laughter is more reasonable, and lesse absurd, than your tears. For ye should have wept when ye gave up your ships and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the use of armes, without the good leave of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps us under, and holds us in assur'd servitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrang out of your private purses, purposes, ye have thereof some sense. God grant that the time com: not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, that it was the very least part of your misery for which ye have shed these tears. Thus discomfited Hannibal unto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsell, repented when it was too late, and instead of cursing their own disorders, which had bred this grievous disease, accused the Physician, whose noble endeavours had been employed in procuring the remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Masanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Army, with high commendations not undeservedly. To him also he assigned over those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein to say truth, he gave him but his due, and that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romans, and friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deservings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Lilybaeum, Scipio with some part of his Army took his way home to Rome by land, and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no less glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he passed along. He entered the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any triumph celebrated with so great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and dyed soon after in prison; or whether he were dead a while before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, That it was a barbarous custom of the Romans, to insult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea, though they were such, as had always made fair and courteous war. But hereof we shall have better example ere the same age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous war past, whereof the Romans had bin in a manner without hope that ever they should see Italy free. This made them look cheerfully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African: filling him by the name of that Province which he had subdued. This honourable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of less desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated unto themselves the title of Countreys, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

For the great similitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, we are less to wonder, if we finde lesse variety: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious obnoxious unto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wils of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse; but failing in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with such number of men, as might have seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home again, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine Warre, devised upon that conquest the rest, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trained Army, had made attempt upon Greece, the issue might, in humane reason, have been farre different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them to employ the travell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their own. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greeks (in which kinde it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misunderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be soiled by any of lesse noed excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evilmerodach, had stumbled, Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entered into war against the Romans. This war he undertook as it were for his minds sake: having received no injury, but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended conquests of Sicily and Africk. But when the Romans by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their own vertue to be of richer metall, than was the more shining valour of the Greeks: then did all the bravery of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans, in time following, to think more highly of themselves. For since they had overcome the best Warriour in Greece, even Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a year after Spain present make himself Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those unwarlike Provinces, which in compasse of 12. years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their own devotion by some good means, the whole Countrey of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed away which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soon after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertain any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had a lo then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queen Teuta made at the same time cruell war upon the Greeks: wasting their Countrey, and sacke their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queen was not slow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them, being now the subject of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reign, and his first Actions. It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. years, new Kings began to reign in the most of all Countries known; and 3. of them young boies, in 3. of the greatest kingdomes. This hapned from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria in whose room succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolemy Philopater succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt unto his father Euergetes. And Philip the son of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. years old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens and most of the Greeks, by the decease of his Uncle Antigonus Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time a fo was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Artaxarthes then began his reign in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himself King over the Lacedamonians, whose Common-weal, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaens, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third years of the 100. and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage, and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemy, and the rest, we shall speak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soon after the beginning of his reign, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it self by the help of Antigenus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subjection unto Cleomenes, was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have been to the Spartans; and therewithall it lay open unto the violence of the Aetolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Aetolians were no men to be idle, nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messenians that were their own Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no lesse unexpected, than it was unjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoil of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Aetolians passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they listed. Old Aratus could hardly abide these Aetolians, as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the injuries, wherewith most ingratfully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. He was therefore so hasty to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay few daies untill the time of his own Office came; being chosen Prator of the Achaens for the year following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himself a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of an Army. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their booty, through a part of the Country, wherein he might very easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so near, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Achaens, they got hence by only the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Aetolians invaded Peloponnesus again; having no more to do, than to passe over the narrow Straights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans.
 There joyned with them, in this their second invasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war unto the coast of Greece: made bold to seek adventures again, and did great mischief. Demetrius Phariurus, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell upon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Aegean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could else-where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Aetolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havock in the Country now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment laid upon the Lacedamonians; who were thought underhand to have favoured the Aetolians, in meer despight of the Achaens and Macedonians; by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Lacedamonians had been so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstain from comming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soon to appease, and meant alwayes to remain at his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did mis-understand the Lacedamonians: but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Boeotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining upon the Aetolians: and desiring to have war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters unto the Aetolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of the same and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. But when the Aetolians understood this for certain, they adjourned the Councell unto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Aetolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prator, that was Author of these Invasions made on Peloponnesus, and the only man, in 30 a fort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where he prepared busily for the war against the year following. He also assayed the Illyrians, Scerdilaidas, with fair words and promises, whom he easily won from the Aetolian side, forasmuch as the Aetolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the war in their own Country, sent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedamonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war unto the Aetolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers answers according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Aetolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithfull meaning in that war, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood upon a needles point, and desired to be held excused, untill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the war was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Town which the Aetolians held upon their borders, and said, that they durst not be over-bold, untill that 40 the bridge were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedamonians, the chief of them studied only, how to manage the treason for which their City had been so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three years together continued subject against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should return out of Egypt to reign over them again, and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publique safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had prevailed them. And hereto they referred all their counsails: bring perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themselves, by adhering firmly to thole which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and thole the greater part, were still devifing, how to make all ready for Cleomenes againft his return; and fought to join with the Ætolians, which were the moft likely to give him ftrong affiftance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durft more freely fpeak their minds: but the contrary fide was the more paffionate, & fpared not by murders or any other violent courfes, to let forward their defire. Neither did it fuffice, that about thefe times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which thefe intended: fancying unto themfelves the glory of their Anceftors in fuch Ages paft, as were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moft able man to reftore them unto their greatneffe and luftre; 10 which once he had in a manner performed: But fince he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deferving virtue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and thole of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without fuch helps, they muft continue little better than fubjects unto the Macedonian, and far lefs by him refpected, than were the Achaens. Thus were they tranfported by contention of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moft working fpirits among them, procured the Ætolians to fend an Embaffie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durft have made himfelf the Author. Much difputation, and hot, there was, between thole of the Macedonian party, and thefe their oppofites: in fuch wife that nothing could be concluded, untill by mafacre or banifhment of all, or the chief, that fpake againft the Ætolians, the 20 diverfity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaens, who had fpared the City, when they might have destroyed it. Then alfo they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was fo nice, and fo regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choofing of the one King, that we may juftly wonder, how they grew fo careleffe in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Agefpolis, the fon of Agefpolis, the fon of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reign over them, as their apparent to his grandfather. This Agefpolis was a young Boy, ftanding in need of a Guardian: and had 30 an Uncle, his Fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet becaufe the Law required, that the fon, how young foever, fhould have his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though ftanding in need of a man, were fo punctuall in obfervation of the Law, that they made this child their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall Family, though there was no want of heirs: yet would not the people trouble themfelves about any of them, to examine the goodneffe of his Clam, but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdom, beftowed upon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himfelf be faluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partifans, and to approve his worth by action, invaded the Country of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of 40 peace. There he did great fpoil, and won divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedæmon. After fuch open hoftility, the Lacedæmonians declared themfelves on the Ætolian fide; and proclaimed war againft the Achaens.

Thus the beginnings of the war fell out much otherwife, than the Achaens and their Confederates had expected, when they firft made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertain answer: the Meffenians would not fir: all the burden muft lye upon themfelves and the poor Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedæmonians, could affail on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, 50 paffing over the Bay of Corinth, furprifed the Town of Agira: which if they could have held, they fhould thereby grievoufly have molefted the Achaens, for that it ftood in the mid-way between Aginum and Sydon, two of their principall Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Country. But as Agira was taken by furprife: fo was it prefently loft again, through greedineffe of fpoile; whileft they that fhould have made it their firft care, to affure the place unto themfelves, by occupying the citadel and other pieces of ftrengh, fell heedlefly to ranfack private houfes, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great slaughter back unto their Fleet. About the fame time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coaft of Archia; wafting all the Territory of the Dymeans and other people, that were firft beginners of the Achaean Confederacy. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head againft thefe Invaders, but were fo well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They fent for help unto their Prætor, and to all the Towns of their Society in vain. For the Achaens having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themfelves: neither could they get any ftrengh of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had 10 covetoufly with-held part of their due from thole that ferved them therein. So through this difability of the Achaens, and infufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publick fervice, & to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus alfo with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Acarnanians, that were confederate with Philip & the Achaens. Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilft their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponnefus. The Epirots joynd all their forces with him: and by fuch their willing readineffe, drew him to the fiege of a Frontier piece, which they defired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped fhortly to make themfelves Mafters of Ambracia. There he fpent forty dayes, ere he could end the bufineffe; 20 which tended only to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his firft coming in; it was thought that he might have had an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon fmall Towns or Forts: and not feldome, that the impertunity of Affociates, to have their own defires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to thole ufes for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the profecution of their main defigns. Thus was our King Henry the eight led afide, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperor to the fiege of Tonnynay: at fuch time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the ftrong City of Terwin was loft, and that his Cavallery, wherein refted his chief confidence, two thoufand were beaten by the Earl of Effex with feven hundred Engliſh, was thinking to 30 withdraw himfelf into Brittain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The ftay that Philip made at Ambracia, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in fuch fort, as their Prætor Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Country; and therewith not only to over-run Thelfalie, but to make impreffion into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dimin, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forfaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, he took, and razed to the ground. He fpared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but overturned all: and among the reft, he threw down the Statues that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Country-men at his return; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto 40 Peloponnefus, but even to Macedon it felf. But this their pride was foon abated; and they rewarded fhortly at home in their own Country, for their pains taken at Dimin. Philip having difpatched his work at Ambracia, made a ftrong invafion upon Ætolia. He took Phocia, Metropolis; Oeniade, Pæanium, Elæus; and divers other Towns and Caftles of theirs: of which he burnt fome, and fortified others. He alfo beat the Ætolians in fundry skirmifhes: and wafted all the Country over, without receiving any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Straights into Peloponnefus, and to do the like fpoil in the Country of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently foli-cited by the Achaean Embaffadours; news came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Country. Thefe Dardanians were a barbarous peo-ple, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon, and 50 were accuftomed to seek booty in that wealthy Kingdom, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Peloponnefus; they purpofed in his abfence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themfelves in his Country; as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to difmiff the Achaean Embaffadours, (whom he fhould have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience untill another year. So he took his way homewards: and as he was paffing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired unto him Demetrius Phærius; with no more than one Ship, that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himself a friend to Antigonus Dison in the wars of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready at their first request, to take part with Philip's Captains. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardaniens hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army, and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Agolians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirots: whom for the harms by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they required with all extremities of War, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, & all thought of war, until another year, was laid aside: Philip stole a journey into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, & about four hundred Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth, He commanded the gates to be shut, that no word should be carryed forth of his arrivall. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achaean Souldiers ready to meet him. The enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meet with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to fear: since the Achaens themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; untill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellows, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners, or slain. By this exploit which he did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewise he purchas'd both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won Epiphia, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He won it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake such a piece of work at such an unseasonable time of the year, was careless of providing even such store of weapons, as might have serv'd to defend it. The Town was preserv'd by the King from sack, and given to the Achaens, of his own meer motion, before they request'd it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for very fear; hearing how easily he had taken Epiphia. This Town also he gave to the Achaens. The like liberality he us'd towards others, that had ancient title unto places by him recover'd. Then fell he upon the Countrey of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandry, and lived abroad in Villages; even such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia: where having done sacrifice to Jupiter, feasted his Captains, and refresh'd his Army three dayes; He proceeded on to the spoil of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætolians, in the spoils of their otherwise-deserving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattell he took, with great numbers of slaves, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Towns, whereinto a great multitude of the Countrey-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his journey, by sending Embassadors to yeeld before he came. And some that were field with Garrisons against their wils, took courage, to set themselves at liberty, by seeing the King so near: to whose Patronage thenceforth they betook themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Ætolian Captains, because they distrust'd their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Countrey, than the sharpness of winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians: but they made such hast from him, that he could not overtake them, till they had cover'd themselves within the Town of Samicum, where they thought to have been safe. But Philip assault'd them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining license to depart, with their lives and armes. Having performed to much in this expedition, the King repos'd himself a while in Megalopolis, and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the winter.

Before the Kings arrivall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedaemonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia, & threatned to do great matters. But when they were admonish'd, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home.

This

This Lycurgus, as he had so other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money, so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Usurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himself to have best right unto the Kingdome, purpos'd to make way thereunto by massacre of his opposites; & afterwards to confirm himself, by propounding unto the multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equal distribution of all the lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. He won to his party some two hundred men, with whom he fell upon the Ephori, as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto predispos'd; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilst he was using his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiv'd whereabout they went, and distist presently away. So he lived afterwards among the Achaens a banish'd man, & hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: & suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to drive out his fellow-King young Agessipolis, whereby he made himself Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspect'd in such sort, as once he should have been apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might have been defended, yet rather than to adventure himself into judgement, he chose to flee for a time, and sojourn among his friends the Ætolians. His well-known velenemy in opposition to the Macedonians, had procur'd unto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they began to consider the weakness of their own surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, he took better heed unto himself: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they list'd. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant, or at what time it was, that he chased Agessipolis out of the City, I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three usurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the last of the three very justly deserved. Whatsoever he was toward some private Citizens, in the war against Philip, he behaved himself as a provident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

§. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsellors: who afterwards wrought treason against him, and were justly punished. He invaderth the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted unto them.

Whilst the King lay at Argos devising upon his business for the year following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatness, as they were like to have spoil'd all that he took in hand. Antigonus Dison had left unto Philip such Counsellors, as to him did seem the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chief of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, & also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himself a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable piece of service to his Prince, if he could reduce the Achaens unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to passe, during the late Expedition he had caus'd some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaens out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, he was bold to chastise some of that Nation, causing his Ministers to take and whip them. If any of them offer'd (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to help their fellows; them he laid by the heels, and punished as Mutiners. Herby he thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and think nothing unjust that pleas'd the King. But these Achaens were tenderly sensible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to help them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves unto old Aratus; and besought him to think upon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seem. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had been wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begun. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. He thought so well of his own Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to do the King any valuable service, in business of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to begin at the head; since, in biting at the tail, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Achaens there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especial friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himself: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be fain to deal precisely with the Achaens, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himself commended, then should the Achaens, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conform themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, he drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Achaens were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have been needfull in a business of more importance, the King by fair words and threatnings together, obtained so much, that Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new favourites, was chosen Prætor, in stead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Paras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yielded it up for fear, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it upon the Dymeans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertook to make them forsake their alliance with the Etolians, and joyn with him upon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to do, he willed Amphidamus to let them understand, that he would render unto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; that he would defend them from all forraign invasions; and that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their own Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion upon their Countrey: then began the Eleans, (that were not before over-hasty to believe such fair promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on work for no other end, than to breed a mutuall diffidence between them and the Etolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him prisoner into Etolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himself, in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marvelling what should be the cause, that he heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles his Counsellor thereby took occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his son together, had such devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the son) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonians: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lye, devised by Apelles himself, upon no other ground than his own malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it over again to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, taking talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such ungratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaens, and therein having made it known what ye are to depart unto Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Old Aratus gravely admonished the King; That whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his own, or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to give credit, untill he had diligently examined the business. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, that the King should make himself the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yes, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well, and said that he would make sufficient inquiry. So passed a few daies: wherein whilst Apelles delayed to bring in the proof, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracy of the Arati: which when he found no better than a meer device against his honourable friends; he entertained them in loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The unrefrall temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to pass, began (as commonly Ambition useth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himself to his cunning again: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Arati: so failing of them, he thinks it wildome to lay for the King himself, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which drave away flies out of the chimney; but was carved (net and all) into the Aire by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtle workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lievtenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captain of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, and Megalæus chief of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his own into their rooms. Against Alexander he went to work the ordinary way, by calumny and privy detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he used more finess; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of war, and one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a wime Sun. In the mean season Aratus retired himself; and sought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the people. Wherefore a great deal of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corn, wherewith he should have been furnished by the Achaens. This made the King understand his own error; which he wisely sought to reform betimes. He perswaded the Achaens to rejoyne their Parliament from Agium, to Sycion, the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom therewith he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travell of these worthy men, he easily obtained what he would of the Achaens. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand; with great store of Corn: and further decreed, that so long as he himself in person followed the wars in Peloponnesus, he should receive ten talents a month. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might invade the Etolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things go forward so well without his help; even by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracy with Leontius and Megalæus: binding himself and them by Oath, to crosse and bring bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability to do any thing without them; should make him speak them fair, and be glad to submit himself to their direction. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child; and therefore these wise men perswaded themselves, that by looking big upon him; and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own misgovernment of his affairs, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needs go to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behinde with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oarh, than of their duty.

His Fleet and Army being in a readinesse: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his forces against the Eleans, to whose aid therefore the Ætolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would have fallen, as soon after it did, upon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Acheans, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. He himself with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephalenia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling over against it, used to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he besieged the Town of Palea, that had been very serviceable to the Enemy against him and his Confederates; and might be very useful to him, if he could get it. Whilst he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen ships of war from Scardalides; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messinians. But the Town was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts save one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his best; and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slain, not of the worst Souldiers; but such as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treason of their Captain, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedy; and therefore he thought upon breaking up the siege. For it was easier unto the Townes-men to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed and uncertain what course to take: the Messinians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their own Country. The Messinians alleged, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Country: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Etesian winds which then blew, serving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those winds, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-dayes) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gave better counsell, and prevailed: he shewed how unfitting it were, to let the Ætolians over-run all Thessaly again, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Army farre off to seek small adventures. Rather, he said that the time now served well to carry the war into Ætolia: since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one half of their strength. As for Lycurgus, he was not strong enough to do much harm in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against them. According to this advice, the King set sail for Ætolia, and enters the Bay of Ambrycia, which divideth the Ætolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and joynd with him as many of them as could bear arms, to help in taking vengeance upon their bad neighbours. He marched up into the in-land Country: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; he pushed on to Thermum, which was the receptacle of the Ætolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great fastnesse, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow, steep, and difficult ascent. There did the Ætolians use to hold all their chief meetings, their Fairs, their election of Magistrates, and their solemn Games: There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careless in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoils wherof whereof he found such plenty, that he thought the pains of his journey well recompenced. So he loaded his Army: and consuming all that could not be carried away, for so not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Ætolians; in remembrance of their like courtlesie, shewed upon the Temples of Dion and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour have been forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monseigneur du Gourgues the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would do, he beleev'd before; and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush, fell upon his skirts: but he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Illyrians; who slaying behinde the rest, did set upon the backs of the Ætolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rear the Army that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning down those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, he safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his fleet. Once the Ætolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Syratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and follo'd to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious expedition being every way compleat, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast unto all his friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megalæas. They came because they could not chuse: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleasure they took in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to think, that they should be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings business; since Apelles himself, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexterity. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reviling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great uprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him fend for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megalæas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to give him froward answers: inso much, as they said at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischief as he deserved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megalæas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why said the King, it was even I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angry; seeing himself out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megalæas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victory at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megalæas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak, that he, and Crinon one of his fellows, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crinon being remanded back to prison; and Leontius becoming Bail for Megalæas. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deal of business this year. For as soon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an Expedition against the Lacedæmonians. These and the Eleans had done what harm they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Acheans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill success, yet so as they hindered them from doing such harm as else they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the country about Lacedæmon: & was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleve that he was returned out of Ætolia. He took not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waite in the fields: and having beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carried back with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattell, slaves, and other Country spoil. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and he would them to deal first with the Ætolians; who if they would make the same request, should not finde him unreasonable. The Ætolians had sped ill that year: neither saw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean season they had been grievously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the centre of their own Country. All Greece and Macedon was up in arms against them, and their weak Allies the Eleians and Lacedemonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keep the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entered into this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of the nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whilst the fe things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sortd to no good effect. The soldiers were easily & quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger spent it self in a noise, and breaking open of doors, without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the Soldiers themselves, repeating of their intolerance, desired to have the Authors of the tumult fought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were afraid, lest the matter would soon come out of it self to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason, requesting him speedily to repair unto Corinth, where he might stand between them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while been wanting to the business, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addressed themselves unto him, and received from him their dispatch in every business. Likewise the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees, took occasion to magnifie the virtue of Apelles, making slight mention (or no mention) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himself out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his special care, that money and all things needfull for the publique service, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the King, for very need, to sell his own Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would give assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the City of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetched in with great pomp and royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers, which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falshood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his own Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacy, he used him not at all. This taught Megaleas to look to himself, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Tampron his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of service, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers to signify what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent unto the King in his behalf. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to trial before their return: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hasty then else he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Ætolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words, and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to sink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King understood more perfectly the falshood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him so poor. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megaleas, who was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his son, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their lives. Megaleas also, neither daring to stand to trial, nor knowing whither to flee, was weary of his own life; and slew himself about the same time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this war upon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Nevertheless, being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorry. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this unquiet Nation; he thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the War should rest upon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the year following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yielding to let them winter in their own Country. In his return homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolomy, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his imprisonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Towns, from which the Dardaniens, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his Kingdom: when he had thus provided for safety of his own; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodians and Cibians, with others from Ptolomy King of Egypt, and from the Citie of Bizantium, re-continuing the former solicitation about the peace. This fashion had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to set the whole Country at liberty: No sooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of war, but presently there were found Interestors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad sought to binde unto them those people, that were howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good souldiers. But hereby it came to passe, that the more froward sort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robbery, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient for to redeem their quiet. They had, since the late Treaty of Peace, done what harm they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in fear to be more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the War as soon as they might. Philip made such answer unto the Embassadors, as he had done the former year; That he gave not occasion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to live in rest, must first be dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himself would return such answer as he should think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedonia, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battell at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleasure dispute about finishing War between themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Country should be at peace within it self: and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly serving to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they stood in fear of danger threatening them at hand: but being soon after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so far from observing and following their own good counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves, and the whole Country (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keep what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the persuasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal against the Romans. The tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

THIS being agreed upon: the Greeks betook themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the business of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battell of Cannæ: after which he joynd in league with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own lost Kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonians, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsell, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise been far more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal terms; and thereby, as did Hiero, a far weaker Prince, have both secured his own Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chief place in his friendship. The issue of the counsell which he followed, will appear soon after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon such Conditions that might easily be broken, have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punic War. Wherefore I will only here set down the tenour of the League between Him and Carthage; which may seem not unworthy to be read, if only in regard of the form it self then used: though it had been over-long to have been inserted into a more buisie piece.

The Oath and Covenants between HANNIBAL Generall of the Carthaginians, and XENOPHANES, Embassadour of PHILIP King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with Xenophanes the son of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the son of Demetrius hath sent unto us, for himself and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo: before * the God * ^{Demon.} of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus: before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before the Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth: before Rivers and Meadows, and Waters: before all the Gods that have power over Carthage: before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of Greece: before all the Gods that are Presidents of War, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Army: Be it agreed between You and Us, that this Oath stand for friendship and loving affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, Upon Covenant, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall, and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians, using the same Laws, and of the Ætians, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers & Associates, and of all Towns and Nations with which we hold friendship in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, & with whom we shall hold friendship, or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preferred by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greeks as are their Associates. In like manner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Associates, be saved and preferred by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Ætians, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter joyn with Us in Italy. We shall not take Counsell one against the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtilty, We shall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which We have already league and friendship. We also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already league and friendship. The War that We have with the Romans, have We also with them, untill the Gods shall give Us a new and happy end. We shall aid Us with those things whereof we have need, and shall do according to the Covenants between Us. But if the Gods shall not give unto You and Us their help in this War against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, We shall make friendship in such wise, that We shall be partakers of the same friendship, With Condition, That they shall not have power to make War upon You: Neither shall the Romans be Lord over the Corcyreans, nor over those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrhachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Attinania. They shall also render unto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make War upon You or Us; We will succour one another in that War, as either shall have need. The same shall be observed in War made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendship. To this league if We or You shall think fit to add or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. II. III.

How Philip yielded to his naturall vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick War. He possioneth Aratus: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himself as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punick War, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his own estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Country. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath been said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking thoroughly into his nature, did accommodate himself to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloody, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to do what he listed, and not otherwise listig to do what he ought, than so far forth, as by making a fair shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he should busie himself in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policy, to bring the Greeks that were his Associates, under a more absolute form of subjection. Hereunto Apelles had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boysterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himself deeply wronged, if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man, with the reins in his hand, those affections which himself did onely seem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus which the violence of Apelles could never do.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction, among the Messenians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a foreign War) unto domestick objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In proceesse of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himself. At his coming thither, he found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired unto him. He asked the Governors, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Laws to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, he said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few: as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to go roundly to work, ere that he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governors therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion, the people took Arms: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage, almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seems, that it would be easie to worry the Sheep, when the Doggs their guardians were slain. But his falsehood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein he should need the help and countenance of his best friends; he was content to smother his displeasure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to do sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keep the place to his own use:

use; for that it was of notable strength, and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whilst he was therefore sacrificing, and had the entralls of the beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himself. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have soothed him a little; were it onely for desire to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his son. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a Soother, thou mayst go thy wayes, and let slip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his horns. Thus he spake; resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus unto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs hear the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Messenians: But if, by seizing upon Ithome, he must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it far better to depart with his souldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his enemies.

To this good advice, Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike thenceforth growing between him and the Arats; whom he thought more froward than befemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly discovered his tyrannous purposes; so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, he had been dishonest with his sons wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his own Country-man, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to bear him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That unhoneest counsells are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But he would needs have them so to remain, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his will, he seized upon their Town of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himself strong enough to do what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to help them. Thus in stead of settling the Country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, untill it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilst he was thus labouring to binde the hands that should have fought for him in Italy, M. Valerius the Roman came unto those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Etolians to break the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War; the occurrences whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In managging whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captain: yet when leisure served, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the liberty of the Messenians; but made another journey into their Country, with hope to deceive them as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not halcy to trust him too far. When he saw that his cunning would not serve, he went to work by force; and calling them his enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to help him in such an enterprise. In this attempt upon Messene, he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angry he waxed against those that seemed not to favour his injurious doings. Wherefore, by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenent, he poisoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, he poisoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would never have been known, because they were done secretly, and the poisoners themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achæia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Processions, to be celebrated every year twice, with a Priest ordained unto him for that purpose; as was accustomed unto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apello: which is like enough to have been true, since the help of the Divell is never failing to the increase of Idolatry.

The loving memory of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but work in the Achaëans a marvellous dislike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shal therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsell for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally known or beleaved: so neither were they in case to subfist, without his help that had committed it. The Ætoli-ans were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were soon divulged, especially that main point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Ætoli-ans shoud have the Country and Towns; but the Romans the spoil, and carry away the people to sell for slaves. The Achaëans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make straight alliance with the Ætoli-ans, as knowing their unci-will disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greeks account all other Nations except their own) to make havock of the Country. The same consideration moved also the Lacedæmonians to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Ætoli-ans, whose friendship they had embraced in the late war. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achaëans his Confederates, sufficed to retain them: especially, at such time, as their own necessity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himself the Dymeans by an inestimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Ætoli-ans; and redeeming their people whereforever they might be found, that had been carried away captive, and sold abroad for slaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences past; if the malignity of his naturall condition had not other whiles broken out, and given men to understand, that it was the Time, and not his Verue, which so caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not ashamed; He took Polycratia the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serve to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of such faults he shal be told, when the Romans make war upon him the second time: for, of that which happened in this their first Invasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen Generall of the Achæans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A bat- 40 tell betwene them, wherein Machanidas is slain.

IT happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood up Philopemen : whose notable valour, and great skill in Arms, made the Nation of the Acheans redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careless of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopemen : who being then a young man, and having no command, did especial service to Antigonus at the battell of Sellasia against Cleomenes. Thence forward untill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Isle of Crete : the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom or never at peace between themselves ; he bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horse : wherein he carried himself so fridly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacy to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces : as also he so diligently trained them up in all exercise of service, that he made the Acheans very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterward chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, he had no lesse care to reform their military discipline throughout, whereby his Country might be strong enough to defend it self, and nor any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the help of others. He perswaded the Acheans to cut off their vain expence expence of bravery, in apparell, household-stuffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost upon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to prove the better Souldiers, and sutable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had served hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afar off; that were usefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for surprisels, or sudden and hasty Expeditions, whereto Aratus had been most accustomed. But when they came to handle strokes, they were good for nothing, so long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopemen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightily, to use a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, and altered the form of their embattelling: not making the Files so deepe as had been accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might use the service of many hands.

Eight months were spent of that year, in which he first was Pretor of the Achaens; when Machinidas the Tyrant of Lacedemon caused him to make trial, how his fouldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machinidas was the successor unto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his fore-ger. He kept in pay a strong Army of Mercenaries; and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta, but to hold the City in obedience to himself perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achaens, that were favours of liberty; but to strengthen himself by friendship of the Æolians: who, in making 10 Alliances, took no further notice of vice or vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedemon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achaens, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Æolian Faction. Very unwisely. For in seeking to take revenge upon those, that had lately hindred them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recovering the Mastery of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machinidas to be idle; but alwaies made him ready to fall upon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the 20 absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him faile of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Achaens, and though his own men better Souldiers than were theirs.

While† Philip therefore was buſied elſe-where, he entred the Country of the Macedonians: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, as having stronger friends and weaker oppoſition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Mantineæ; where was fought between them a great battell. The Tyrant had brought into the field upon Carts a great many of engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his enemies, and put them in diſorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen ſent forth his light armature a good way before him; ſo as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To ſecond theſe, from the one and the other ſide came in continuall ſupply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Acheans and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the fight; being ſo far advanced, each before their own Phalanx, that it could no otherwiſe be diſcerned which preſſed forward, or which recoyled, than by riſing of the duſt. Thus were Machanidas his engines made unſerviceable, by the interpolation of his own men; in ſuch manner as the Cannon is hindered from doing execution, in moſt of the battels fought in theſe our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well obſerveth) by ſurmounting their oppoſites in degree of courage; wherein uſually the hired Soldiers of Tyrants exceed thoſe that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppreſſed by Tyranny, ſince the one, by doing their beſt in fight, have hope to acquire ſomewhat beneficiall to themſelves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to aſſure their own ſervitude; ſo the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his proſperity, have as good cauſe to maintain his quarrell as their own; whereas they that ſerve under a free State, have no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare ſpend. Further than this, when a free State hath gotten the victory, many companies (if not all) of foreign Auxiliaries are are presently cast; & therefore such good fellows, will not take much pains to bring the war to an end. But the victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers; because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more subjects; and therefore stands in fear of more, that should seek to take revenge upon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Acheans, being forced to give ground, were urged so violently in their retreat by those of Machinidas, that shortly they betook themselves to flight; & could not be staid by any persuasions of Philopomen, but ran away quite beyond the battell of the Acheans. This disaster had been sufficient to take from Philopomen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machinidas, and found in him that error which might restore the victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gave chase to unto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battell his Lacedaemonians; whom he thought sufficient to deal with the Acheans, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashness had carried him out of fight, Philopomen advanced towards the Lacedaemonians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficulty, especially for Foot. The Lacedaemonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better soldiers than the Acheans, who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battell; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Acheans, who drave them headlong into the ditch again. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopomen getting over the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopomen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machinidas had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chase, but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custody of a bridge that was over the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet, with a lusty troupe of Horse about him, he made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Acheans in disorder; and to set upon their backs, as they were carelessly pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Company saw Philopomen ready to make good the bridge against them; then began every one to look, which way he might shift for himself. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopomen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge unto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling upon him at length in the ditch it self, as he was getting over it, slew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battell on the Lacedaemonians side about four thousand: and more than four thousand were taken prisoners. Of the Achean Mercenaries, probable it is, that the loss was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should have need.

§. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Acheans learned to think well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline and continual exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferior to any, that should have brought against them no great odds of number. As for the Macedonian, he made no great use of them. But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He took in hand many matters together, or very nearly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would have done him service, they must, by helping him to oppress others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deal with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Ætolians in war against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Nobleman, otherwise than as he was enabled by his own, and by his Fathers virtue. His fortune began in Philetarus his Uncle: who being grieved, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times repaid much confidence in Eunuchs, whose affections could not be obliged unto wives or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captain following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betook himself to Lyfimachus King of Thrace. Lyfimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accounts. But when at length he stood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant; he fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Town of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lyfimachus. The town and money, together with his own service, he offered unto Selenchus the first, that then was ready to give Lyfimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Selenchus, having slain Lyfimachus, died shortly after himself, before he made use of Philetarus or his money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus, with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty years as an absolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is said to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before such time they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetarus left his Kingdom to the elder of these, or to the son of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the dissention between Selenchus Galvinius and Antiochus Hierax, the sons of the second Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, neer unto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that served under his Enemy, he used a pretty device. He wrote the word Victory upon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off: and when the hot liver of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, he published this unto his Army as a Miracle; plainly foretelling that the gods would be assitant in that Battell.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadful enemy to Selenchus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty years, he died by a surfeit of over-much drink, and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was son unto Attalus the youngest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his own proper forces he restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Achæus: who setting up himself as King against Antiochus the Great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Trojan, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, he recovered all that he had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment, but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters, or interposed themselves, without invitation; and found themselves work in quarrels of their own making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his war against Bizantium. Whereunto when he had descended; they neverthelesse within a while after invaded his Kingdom. He obtained against them a great victory; and used it with great cruelty, sparing neither age nor sex. But the swarm of them increasing, they occupied the Region about Hellepont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheless, presuming afterwards upon their strength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the sharp exaction whereof, they had no more respect unto Attalus, than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and he being victorious, compelled them to contain themselves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their neighbours, and to fill up the Arms of those that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the slothfull reign of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister unto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdices, as is shewed before. But the son of that King,

King, whom Perdiccas crucified, esp'ying his time while the Macedonians were at civil wars among themselves; recovered his Dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to have issued from the royall house of Achemenes. The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Pylmenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the war of Troy. These, applying themselves unto the times, were always conformable unto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reign in Bythinia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captains, made an expedition into their Country, where he was vanquished. They 10 had afterwards to do with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, untill the reign of Prusias, whom we have already sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Town of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, King of Bythinia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and the like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks; and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians

Prusias, as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected. He therefore strengthened himself, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary side, entered into a strict Confederacy with the Etolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Etolian war, and was devising with Antiochus about sharing between them two the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Ptolomy Philopater, a friend unto them both, was newly dead; and had left his son Ptol. Epiphanes, a young child, his heir: the Bythinian entreated this his Father-in-law to come over into Asia, there to win the Town of the Ciani, and bestow it upon him. Prusias had no right unto the Town, nor just matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him, and therewithall rich. Philip came, as one that 30 could not well deny to help his Son-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilest he lay at the siege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: intreating him to forsake the enterprize. He gave dilatory, but otherwise gentle answers: making shew as if he would condescend to their request, when he intended nothing lesse. At length he got the Town: where, even in presence of the Embassadors, of whose solicitation he had seemed so regardfull, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendered himself odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his fact was detested of the Rhodians, who had made vehement intercession for the poor Ciani: and were advertised by Embassadors of purpose sent unto them from Philip. That, howsoever it were in his power to win 40 the Town as soon as he listed, yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, he was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency, the Embassadors said, that he would manifest unto the world what slanderous tongues they were, which noised abroad such reports; as went of his falshood and oppression. Whilest the Embassadors were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theatre to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Town of Cios, and, after a cruell slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaves of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians took this in great despight, no lesse were the Etolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captain to take charge of the Towns, being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacy to his own) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moved with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his own estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong party in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchasing with much liberality the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, having lost their own. On the friendship of the Etolians he had cause to presume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many and great, in their late war war with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he easily drew into a freight alliance with him, by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Upon confidence in these his friends, but most of all, in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open war. It had been unreasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the enemy tended, since his desire to fasten upon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not far from Chios, and fought with him a battell at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own ship on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admirall of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battell took harbor under a Promontory, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wracks upon the shore: Yet forasmuch as he had suffered far greater losse of ships and men, than had the enemy; and since he durst not in few days after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and won some towns in Caria: whether only in a bravery, and to despight his opposites: or whether upon any hopeful desire of conquest, it is uncertain. The stratagem, by which he won Prinassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a mine; and finding the earth so stony, that it resisted his work, he nevertheless commanded the Pioners to make a noise under ground; and secretly in the night time he raised great mounds about the entrance of the mine, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went marvellously forward. At length he sent word to the Town-men, that by his undermining, two acres of their wall stood onely upon wooden props, to which if he gave fire, and entred by a Breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetched all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise up those heaps which they saw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the mine. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-faced, and gave up the Town as lost, which the enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himself in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian war, seek matter of quarrell against Philip. The Athenians upon slight cause, proclaim war against Philip; moved thereto by Attalus; whom they batter. Philip wins divers Towns; and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Embassador. The furious resolution of the Aegyptians.

These Asiaticque matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet served well to make a noise in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making war in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were factious, and seldom or never at peace. As for the Macedonian; though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece ever since the reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturalls: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had been most beholding unto him, were nevertheless weary of him, by reason of his personall faults. 30 All this gave hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the divisions of the Country were such, that every petty Estate was apt to take counsell apart for it self, without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprize. They were already quite exhausted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republike, all their money: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive untill fifteene or sixteene years after this, their whole sum back again. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present money, but much of it in Land: it behoved them to rest a while; and bestow the more more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to be-row cost: Wherefore they took no pleasure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that solicited not only the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Islands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meane shortly to hold war with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himself, or by his alliance in to Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians; especially with the help of the Æ- tolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his own professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men unto the war, and give it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affaires of those that were more mighty than himself. He was too unskillfull, or otherwise too unapt, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he deserved to have them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the utmost in making war upon them; or in desisting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs past; by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of peace, which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unless they thinke themselves justly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covennants of peace between him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such Articles of peace can be held inviolable, save onely * by the water of Styx, that is, by Nec- essitie: which whilest it bindes one party, or both unto performance making it apparent, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) be presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But 30 when once they had peace with Carthage; then was the River of Styx dried up: and then could they swear as * Mercurie did in the Comedy, by their own selves, even by their good swords, that they had good reason to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Africa, and the present war against Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough; the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took state upon them nevertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Asarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were delivered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainly said to be available unto felicity after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent 40 questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meer error, not thinking to have therein done amiss; yet, as it had been for some heinous crime, they were put to death. All their Country-men at home took this in ill part; and sought to revenge it as a publike injury, by war upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; & carried thence a great booty. This indignity stirred up the high-minded Athenians, and made them think upon doing more, than they had ability to performe.
All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadors to king Attalus; gra-tulating his happy successe against Philip, and intreating him to visit their City. Attalus 50 was hereto the more willing, because he understood that the Roman Embassadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rho- dians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoicing that he continued enemy to Philip; and he being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their City, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solemne a pomp as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertaintained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Attalus himself they omitted no point of observance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first coming into the City, they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them hear him speak. But he excused himself; saying, That with an evil grace he should recount unto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed between him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest he with the Rhadians and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to do, he protested, that afterwards it would be vain to crave his help.

There needed little intreaty: for they wereas willing, to proclaim the war, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhadians they also decreed a Crown of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhadians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noise of war, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhadians taking all upon them. But while these were vainly mis-pending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their party: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip won the Towns of Maronea and Æ- nus, with many other strong places about the Hellepont. Likewise passing over the Hellepont, he laid siege unto Abydus; and won it, though he was faine to stay there long.
The Town held out, rather upon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhadians, than any great ability to defend it self against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhadians sent thither onely one Quadrime Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men, far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondred much at this great negligence of them that had taken so 60 much upon them.

These Embassadors, C. Claudius, M. Æmilius, and P. Sempronius, were sent unto Pto- lomy Epiphanes King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that war; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his reign, which (as his father Philopater had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courtesie for which the Roman were to thank him, was, that out of Egypt they had lately been supplied with corn, in a time of extreme dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This message could not but be welcome to the E- gyptian: since it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Romans with corn:
since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall; so had the Embassadors both leisure and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmilius the youngest of them should step aside, and visit Philip, to trie if he could make him leave the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Æmilius, coming to Philip, tells him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhadians, upon whom he made war, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kinde of dependancy upon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhadians had made war upon him: and that he did onely requite them with the like. Do you also (said Æmilius) requite these poor Abydeni with such terrible War, for any the like Invasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to hear himself thus taken short: and therefore he roundly made answer to Æmilius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beauty, and (above all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wish ye to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: if ye do otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in manner of War, no less noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassadors; and had the Town immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearfull oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the City to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilst they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort; that, by exhortation of the Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that he said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the town; or hazzard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fools.

The Romans decree war against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerer resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to help themselves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should win, then rested there no more to do, than that he should presently embarque himself for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five moneths, but in the short space of five dayes sailing. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africk; to shew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleve, that this War with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul halted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancy (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them; though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to think it a benefit unto themselves; that any Greek Town, refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their help against him. But the Senate, intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Eastern parts, had reason to give thanks unto those, that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, even to Pholomy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus, and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the War, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence; the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesus, but took the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the River of Apus, between Dyrrhacium and Apollonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his help: whereof they could make no benefit whilst he was far from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliver them.

them. For which cause he sent unto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces he retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: only some Rovers from Chalcis, in the Isle of Eubœa, and some bands of adventurers out of Corinth, used to take their ships, and spoil their fields: because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Towns. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had been wont in ancient times to undertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicilia: to make war upon the great Perſian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the rest; had now no more than three ships, and those open ones, not much better than long boats. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their own.

§. X.

The Town of Chalcis in Eubœa taken and sacked by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise: maketh the Countrey about, and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. Philip offers to make war against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth again: and provides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyn with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the war.

Philip returning home from Abydos, heard news of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forces: he received advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such work at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the war, and make his own employment better. He grew soon weary of sitting as a Scar-crow, to save the Athenians grounds from spoile; and therefore gladly took in hand a business of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Town-men, who reposed themselves upon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, sailed thither by night, for fear of being detected: and arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He used no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it, (unless he should have left the heartlesse Athenians to their own defence) he set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all provisions for War, which were plentifully filled. Neither were he and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoil which they carried aboard their ships, and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most security, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despatch and hatred unto the King, they overthrew and brake in pieces the Statues to him there erected. This done, they halted away towards Athens: where the news of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias, about some 20. miles thence; so whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haste to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at work in ransacking the Town, and loading themselves with spoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thousand light-armed foot he had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaving at Chalcis only a few to bury the dead, he marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not unpossible to take his enemies, in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the City upon the borders, had not detected him.

him afar off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Town asleep, as fearlesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarm, and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation usall in such a case, understood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did help well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudian were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compass about by sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the Town some mercenary Souldiers, which they kept, of their own, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this, reckoning all those his own, that were thus hardy. He therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave singular proof of his valour: and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drave them with great slaughter back into the City. The heat of his courage transported him further than discretion would have allowed, even to the very gate. But he retired without harm taking; for that they which were upon the Towers over the gate, could not use their casting weapons against him, without much endangering their own people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, neer adjoining unto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Egina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Acheans were devising upon war: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started up in the room of Machanidas, did greater mischief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his mercenaries: and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner upon those that lived under him; and one that in his naturall condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, since his dexterity was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleecing their wives; whom she would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their jewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made, lively representing her; and apparelled it with such costly garments as the used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apega stood, and there use all his art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses; then took he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who sat by in a Chair) could perswade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that rose up and opened the arms, as it were for imbracement. Those arms were full of sharp iron nails, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she griped the poor wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopomen's vertue he stood in fear; and therefore durst not provoke the Acheans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a far worse Captain, was their Prætor, and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopomen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of War; then did Nabis fall upon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their own safety in the Towns.

Against

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for War, when Philip came among them; and had set down what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse; so far much as he alone would ease them of this War, & take the burden upon himself. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilst he made War upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns ungarded, In which respect he thought they would be pleased to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Isle of Eubæa; that so he might securely pursue the War against Nabis. Immediately they found out his device; so that was none other, than to engage their Nation in his War against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Laws forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing War against Nabis, he brake up the Assembly, with every mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpose with the Acheans. Nevertheless he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Philoxenus one of his Captains, that with two thousand men had been doing what harm he might unto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Elenfene, the Haven of Pyrene, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into every of these places; that he could no more than wreak his anger upon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So he destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty of their own; or, having long ago been Masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did he onely pull all down: but caused his men to break the very stones, that they might be unserviceable to their reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon: and there made provision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardaniens, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infect him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpitius the Roman Consul encamped upon the River of Apfus. Thence he sent forth Apustius his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Apustius took sundry Castles and Towns; using such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Town which he won by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, unless they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoil, he was charged in the Reer, upon the passage of a brook, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of these enemies, took prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their Camp. The success of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet served to draw into the Roman friendship those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the son of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Atbamaniens; and Bato the son of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardaniens. They offered their assistance unto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That he would shortly make use of Pleuratus and Bato, when he entered into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Country lay between the Ætolians and Thessaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætolians, to stir them up against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace between his Master and the Ætolians; so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause, to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made their, as if their war in Greece tended onely to the defence of the Ætolians, and yet notwithstanding had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the same sort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants, but now both Syracuse & Messana, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alledged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the *Ætoli*ans: who if they drew such masters into Greece, must not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to consult about War and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and fend them such a Moderator, as went every year from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, that it was best for them, whilest as yet they might, and whilest one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occasion, they hapned to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres ago made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who fought to break it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing wherunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speak next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few dayes past, made War upon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pitifull rehearfall of their own calamities: and said, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feel the same that Attica had felt; yea, that Athen itself, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the Walls and the Roman arms had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their own oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the point in hand. They said, that they had of late made War in the *Ætoli*ans behalf, and that the *Ætoli*ans had without their consent made peace: whereof since the *Ætoli*ans must excuse themselves, by alledging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to give them aid convenient; so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the *Ætoli*ans to take part with them in their war and victory, unless they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired, were themselves carried unto the War by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to help those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cause, why Dorymachus the *Ætoli*an Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatory answer: though he told his Country-men, That by reserving themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall terms: That over-much haste was an enemy to good counsell: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, he passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the State, and therein conclude upon this business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawfull to treat of such affaires, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The *Ætoli*ans invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Philip was glad to hear, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the *Ætoli*ans. He thought them hereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great help; and meant himself to disappoint them of another. His son Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keep the Streights of Pelagonia against the *Dardani*ans; having with him him some of the Kings Councell, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may seem, that the presence of the Kings son, how young soever, would both encourage his Followers, and terrifie the Enemies, by making them at least beleieve, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earnest business called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would serve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned: who took his journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Deffaretii, a people in the utmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the Mountains of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North, untill they joyn in the South with Pindus, inclose the Western parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battell. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Camp into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertain them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was so, that the King was unwilling to hazard all at first upon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his own forces: yet being no lesse unwilling to lose too much in reputation; he made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behave themselves respectively, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him so hotly, that they drove him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targettiers, not staying to let them run into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the work, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battell: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kinde of help which the Romans had never used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce above fourscore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never seen any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilest possibly some were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Consul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely; for the Roman had greater need to fight, than he. Sulpicius was unwilling to loose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so near the Enemy, that was strong in horse, send his men to fetch in corn out of the fields. Wherefore he removed 8. miles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground; and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: even till their presumption, and his own supposed fear, should make them careless. When this was come to passe, he took all his horse, and light-armed foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, between the Forragers and their Camp. There he stayed in covert with part of his forces, to keep the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Country, to fall upon the stragglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with news to the Camp. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them upon the King and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Camp had news of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had hapned to themselves, raised a great multitude. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them help their fellows where they saw it needfull: He himself with the Legions followed. The companies of horse divided themselves, accordingly as they met with adventures upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troops, that were canvassing the field, took their task where they found it: But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himself. They had the disadvantage; as coming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away; and their fellows also might have been, if the King had well bethought himself, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an harvest, he was too greedy about a poor gleanings; the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own safety. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in wait for others, are seldom heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest ways; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogs, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slain under him: and there had been cast away, if a loving subject of his had not alighted, mounted him upon his own horse; and delivered him out of perill, at the expence of his own life, that running on foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashness; & the Consul, with as much dulness, for his dayes service. A little longer stay would have delivered the King from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set upon his Camp, at such time as he fled thither, half amazed with fear of being either slain or taken, they might have won it. But that noble Historian, Livie, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciously observed, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay safe in his Camp; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himself, he was advertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the passage therinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to do somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards look unto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to clear himself of the Romans, as soon as he might. And to that purpose he sent unto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting down trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little use; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more serviceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them, and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) laid open unto the Consul some poor Towns thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yielded for fear. But the spoil of these, and of the fields adjoining, was not sufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themselves apace out of the Country. The King sent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whilest he himself went against the Etolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Etolians, who had reserved himself and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and again; as also that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were fallen upon Macedon; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had been wife. He persuaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaim War, joyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invasion upon Thessaly. They took, and cruelly cruelly sacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they listed. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Aminander more warie than the Etolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his own mountainous Country.

About the same time the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They took likewise the Town of Oreus in the Isle of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly been made with the Etolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans; and the people, for slaves. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foul weather at Seas; or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a year to no effect. War of the Gauls in Italy. An Embassadour of the Romans to Carthage, Maianissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Consul, took charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, having served long in Sicily and Africa, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not be suffered to look unto their own estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had served at Cannæ: as may seem by their complaint, of having been long absent from Italy; whither faine they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertaine. For the History of his yeer is lost: whereof the misse is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antius, as we finde in Livie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Livie himself, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Author; we may reasonably beleeve, that Villius his yeer was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian war, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gauls. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and strong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had been able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved herself, taking warning by her neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that stayed behinde Asdrubal, or Mago in those parts; was now become Captain of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadours to the Carthaginians; giving them to understand, That if they were not weary of the peace, it behoved them to call home, and deliver up, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seem otherwise to have favoured a little of some feare) That of the fugitive slaves belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walk up and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored back to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Maianissa, as also with Vermina the son of Syphax. Unto Maianissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure he might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their war against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe unto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That having been, and being still (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they used not to conferre upon any, save one only upon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authority to make peace with him; was wholly committed unto these Embassadours, upon such termes as they should think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as far as was requisite, requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedonia. King Masaniſſa would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Nomidian horse: but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermia met with the Embassadors, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdom; and without any dispute, agreed with them upon terms of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls: they laid siege unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Pretor came upon them, fought a battell with them, and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battell: 10 and the fruit of the victory was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should have the managing of war among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to think upon the businesse of Macedonia: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counsellour whom they hated; as also to assure unto himself the Acheans, by rendering unto them some Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdom, not onely by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having unprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedonia, taking a journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consull, and had Macedonia allotted him for his Province; whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army. 20

§. XIII.

The Romans begin to make war by negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. Theſſaly waſted by Philip, the Romans, and Aetolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonians, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace, that was vaine. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THE Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battell to the Enemy, as soon as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Towns: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his own weakness. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learne of the subtle Greeks, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not grown so fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poor, and stood indebted, * many yeeres after this unto private men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punick War. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian War; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the lesse need to rely upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consull, into Macedonia. Their Navie, and other meanes could well have served for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Army: but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many and too far from home) have bred some jealousy in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies, more than of their own Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himself unto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdom against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it uncourteously, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to looke unto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to use the aide of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunity, and could also be well contented to afford it; That they could not nor honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deal with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends unto both of the kings) do their best to perswade an atonement between them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded these terms of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soon appear. T. Quintius halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed unto him; which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had served in Spain and Africa. He found Villius the old Consull, (whom at his coming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedonia, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Apsus, or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seek their way into Macedonia, through the poor Country of the Dassaretians; or else win, by force, that passage which the King defended, in taking the former way; they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and been forced to returne back without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Theſſaly, then should they enter into a plentifull Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the river of Apsus, running along through that valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Marij and unpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assailed to climb in the Mountains: but finding himself disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; he was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty dayes.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the war might be ended by composition, upon some reasonable terms. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, among whom he had many friends, that he and the Consull had a meeting together, but nothing was effected. The Consull would have him to set all Towns of Greece at liberty; and make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Wars. Philip was contented to give liberty to those whom he had subdued of late; but unto such, as had been long subject unto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and dominion over them. He also said, That as far forth as it should appear that he had done wrong unto any Town or people whatsoever, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seem convenient in the judgement of some free State, that had not been interested in those quarrells. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no judgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had always been the invader; and had not made War, as one provoked, in his own defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars, and when the Consull was required to name those Towns, that he would have to be set at liberty; the first that he named were the Theſſalians: These had been subjects (though conditionally) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soon as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians; the King in a rage demanded what sharper condition He would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly he flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consull strove in vaine two or three dayes together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himself, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heards-man sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beasts in those Mountains, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, & therefore undertook to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and being promised a great reward, in case he made good his word, had such Com.

Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full of the Moon) and rested in the day-time, for fear of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiscovered by them, because at their banks) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gave notice of their success unto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilest they were on their journey, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians; thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as near as he could unto the Enemies Camp, and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times, untill the shouting of those that ran down the hill, & charged Philip on the back, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betook themselves to flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to save himself. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Camp and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to stand in fear, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himself much better persuaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be persuaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to use any great compulsion. He also himself took it very grievously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him: so that a little hinderance did serve, to make him break off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Etolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readinesse to invade Thessaly; whereinto the ways lay more open, out of their severall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foretold not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaming after their harvest, could not finde enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to avoide. T. Quintius won Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yielded unto him. Rhage he besieged: and having made a faire breach, yet was unable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, having well-near spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to prevaile at Rhage; brake up his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meet him at Anticyra, an Haven Town of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred unto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, where-in he had business, or was shortly like to have. Many Towns in Phocis he won by assault: many were yielded up unto him for fear; and within short space he had (in effect) maltreated it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consul's brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this war, joynd with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They won two Cities in Euboea; and afterward laid siege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arceanall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprize did somewhat help forward the Acheans, in their desire to leave the part of Philip; since it might come to passe, that Corinth it self, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Acheans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been long accustomed. For this King had so many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilest being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of such counsell as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord: his poisoning of Aratus their old Governour: his false dealing with the Megonians, Epirots, and other people 10 their Confederates, and his own dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; and caused them long since to hold him as a necessary evil, even whilest they were unable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopemen, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength, so as without the Macedonians help they could as well subsist, as having him to friend: then did they one-ly think how evil he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers to take away the life of * Philopemen. But failing in this enterprize; and being detected, he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopemen wrought so with the Acheans, that no dis- 10 course was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian, Cycliadas, a principal man among them, and lately their Prator, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Arifternus chosen Prator, who laboured to joine them in society with the Romans.

These news were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans, making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Scycon, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Acheans to joine with them in making War upon Philip. Contrari- 10 wise, the Embassadours of Philip, whom he had also sent for this business, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate request of Philip's Embassadours did no way advance their Masters cause. Rather it gave the Acheans to understand, That he, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe unable to gratifie them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell, who remembering the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memory of those old good turns, which he (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold 10 unto them, & partly had used as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree passed, That they should thence-forward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians they forthwith entred into society: with the Romans (because no League would be of force, untill the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any society at the present, untill the return of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound, rose up out of the Councell, and departed before the 10 passing of the Decree; which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty thereto give assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thank; that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a solemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered it self so plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his hands, if they might have any small assistance. Philocrates a Lieutenent of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a sudden, and finding the multitude ready to joyn with him, he easily compelled the Achaean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, and some other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gave him hope to obtain some good end by Treaty, whilst as yet with his honour he might seek it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen; who should take the work out of Titus his hands; if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect unto himself; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to pre-dispose things unto a Conclusion, for his own reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lami-10 au Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulf of Zion, in the Egean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus with Aminander the Athamian; an Embassador of Attalus; the Admiral of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Ætolians and Achaens. Philip had with him some few of his own Captains, and Cycladas, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods: yet misdoubting some treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans, were, That he should set all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs; and Renegadoes; likewise whatsoever he held of theirs in Illyria; and whatsoever about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Prothomy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire of Ships, Towns, and Temples by him taken and spoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodians would have again the Country of Perea, lying over against their Islands; as also that he should withdraw his garrisons out of divers Towns about the Hellepont, and other Havens of their friends. The Achaens desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjustly, quarrell with him; the other had been long his own by their consent. The Ætolians took upon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Country, leaving it free; and withal to deliver up unto them, whatsoever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithall content; but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly; corrupt-30 ing (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Towns, which else they might have gotten. To answer these malapart Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gallies to be rowed nearer the shore. But they began to plie him afresh: telling him that he must obey his betters, unless he were able to defend himself by force of Arms. He answered them (as he was much given to gybing) with sundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul understand what manner of companions these Ætolians were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greeks; desiring them to abrogate a wicked law, which permitted them to take spoile from spoile: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning 40 of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as War happened between their friends, to hold up the quarrell, by sending Voluntaries to serve on both sides, that should spoile both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he said it was strange that the Ætolians should be so careful thereof, since divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Greecians: wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make slaves of those Ætolians, which were no Greeks. Titus herat smiled, and was no whit offended, to hear the Ætolians well ratled up; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that general demand of setting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well seeme 50 the greatnesse of the Romans; though he would also consider, what might betwix his own dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petty Estates, should thus presume, under countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might he should be thereunto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Achaens he charged with much ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their own; wherein they had laden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheless he said, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himself. Thus

bb. lib. 17.

Thus he addressed himself wholly to the Roman General; unto whom if he could give satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late war (he said) was onely defensive; they having been the offerers: or if he gave them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his son-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seek amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that spoiling a Temple of Venus, he had cut down the Grove, and pleasant walks thereabouts: what could he do more, than send Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would stand to ask such recompence? Thus he jested the matter out: but offered nevertheless, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Pe-10 rea to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to think upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Council, wherewith to advise about them. For your being so ill provided of Coun- sell (said Titus) you may even thank your self; as having murdered all your friends, that were wont to advise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was beleev'd, that he thereby sought to a- bridge the Ætolians of leisure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in private with the Roman General. The sum of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give the Achaens both Argos and Corinth; 10 as also that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodians what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Ætolians, that he would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoever they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendered up. The noise that they made came to Philip's ear: who thereupon desired a third day of meet- ing; and protested, that if he could not persuade them, he would suffer himself to be persuaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken unto good 20 offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions which he had already tendered; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where he would referre himself to the courtlesse of the Senate.

This was even as Quintus would have it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the War. So he easily prevailed with the rest to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for service in the War; and since, without authority of the Senate, he should be unable to proceed resolutely either in War or Peace. Further, he willed them to send their severall Embassadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their preju- 30 dice. Among the rest, he persuaded King Aminander to make a journey to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own command of the Army in Greece might be pro- longed. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reasons which they alleged unto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victory, 40 than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in undertaking to set Greece at liberty. But this (they said) could never be effected; unless especial care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, & Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in servility; that the Senate agreed to have it even so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yeeld up Cor-50 inth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had given them no direction or commission what to say or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors have truly said, That neither the Ætolians, Acheans, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any claim to either of these Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Acheans had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, having stoln it from one Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain unto another) Philip had already condescended to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alledged, even against the Greeks, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might have had honour to conclude the war, if a successor had been decreed unto him. But since he was appointed to continue General: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himself, after the returne of the Embassadors unto Greece, cared to give care unto any talk of peace.

Philip seeing that his Acheans had forsaken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himself unto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedæmonians under Cleomenes, with little other help than their own strength, had been almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Acheans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though styling himself King. Yet he sorely vexed the Acheans: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned over into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serve to tie him fast unto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a freight alliance with the Lacedæmonians, by giving some daughters of his own in marriage unto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Town of Argos; unless by decree of the Citizens themselves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argives: but found them so averse, that in open assembly of the people, they detected the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occasion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philocles, without more ado, to make over the Town which he was ready to receive. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gave him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very love had forsaken the Acheans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himself master of all the gates. A few of the principall men, understanding how things went, fled out of the City at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chief Citizens that stayed behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of money was laid upon all those that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long upon the matter: or played the thieves in purloining their own goods; they were put to the whip, and besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular laws; namely, such as might serve to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poor. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath been an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soon as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to joyn with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he took the paines to crosse over the Straights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soon agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cavill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent unto the Roman, six hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Acheans, upon a Truce for four moneths, referring the final conclusion of peace between them until the War of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long,

§. XIII.

The battell at Cynoscephale, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soon as he understood that he was appointed to have command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War; meant afterwards wholly to rely upon himself.

Titus had in his Army about six and twenty thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessaly, and thereupon addressed himself to seek him out. They had like to have met unawares, neer unto the City of Phææ: where the vantage-grounds on both sides discovered each other; and sent word thereof unto their severall Captains. But neither of them were over hasty to commit all to hazard upon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better discovery. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally back into their severall Camps, with little advantage unto either side. The Country about Phææ was thick set with trees: and otherwise full of gardens and mud-walls; which make it improper for the service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remove back into Scythia, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully served with all necessaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning; and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it onely to waste the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other took. Nevertheless they encamped not far asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them understood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging where he found it by chance. Then sent they forth discoverers again, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Ætolians had not been desperate, the Romans their fellows had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himself was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose to put the fortune of a battell in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thick and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own, if he could use an occasion, the like whereof he should not often finde. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as he embattelled his men; & climbed up those hills, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynoscephale. As soon as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his own light armature were busie in fight, almost at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so far. He had also liberty to choose his ground, as might serve best his advantage; forasmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great use: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, serving nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Nevertheless he found convenient room, wherein to marshall the one part of his Army: and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the rest; embattelling them as they might. Whilst he was doing this: He perceived that his Horsemen and light armature began to shrink, as being fallen upon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He sets forward to help them: and they no lesse hastily draw unto him for succour, having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climb the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertain them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx being a great square battell of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our modern Wars: and being in like manner used, as are ours; was not to be refuted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it self held together undissolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first rank had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvell if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with ten enemies at once; and not able to come nearer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot, or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it, was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he observed, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) upon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the work, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder he made great and present use. He caused the right wing of his battell to march up the Hill against these ill-ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well advised what to do; as having no one man appointed to command that part in chief. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons unusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip having six and twenty thousand in his Army (as he is said to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thousand Horse, four thousand Targettiers, and four thousand light-armed: so shall there remain fourteen thousand Pikes; whereof himself had embattelled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having usually sixteen in File, must, when it consisted of seven thousand, have well-neer four hundred and forty in rank; but four hundred would serve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or seven and thirty Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foot of ground: this Front must have occupied twelve hundred foot, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very near a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champain, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity disjoyn this close battell of the Phalanx; was not every-where to be found. Here at Cynosephale Philip had so much room, as would onely suffice for the one half of his men; the rest were faine to stand still and look about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughness of the Dogs heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in murthering those Enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpful to making of the victory compleat. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on so far, as that himself with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand, and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rear. The hindmost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed save the first five, were accustomed, when the battells came to joyning, to carry their pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it served neither for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Meopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the four sides of it were as so many Fronts looking sundry ways, waies, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be understood, that herein he altered the usuall form; as also at the same time he embattelled his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turn their weapons which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexander's men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the enemy, unless their hindmost ranks could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such provision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise unable to help themselves, threw down their weapons & fled. The King himself had thought until now, that the fortune of the battel was every where alike, & the day his own. But hearing the noise behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of horse, to see how all went; when he beheld his men casting down their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he presently betook himself to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except onely a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this overthrow) until he was gotten into his own kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battell, about seven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slain; and five thousand taken prisoners.

§. XV.

²⁰ T. Quintius falleth out with the *Ætoli*ans, and grants truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

The *Ætoli*ans wonderfully vaunted themselves; and desired to have it noised through all Greece, that the victory at Cynosephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the booty by sacking the Macedonian Camp, whilest the Romans were buied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous condition; purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceived, That by using them with any extraordinary favour, he should greatly offend the rest of his confederates in Greece; who detested the *Ætoli*ans much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battell, Titus made haste unto Larissa, a City in Thessaly, which he presently took. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burn all his letters, and passages whatsoever in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much adversity, he forgot not to provide for the safety of his friends. Yet by thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceive, that he gave them as already lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Town of Lewas, bordering upon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very soon after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in harred of the *Ætoli*ans ever true to Philip, gave up themselves unto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynosephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Persea, a Region of the Continent over against the Island; whereof they had demanded restitution in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks; forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and some help which they borrowed of the Acheans and other their friends, gave battell to Dinocrates the Kings Lievtenant, wherein they had the victory, and consequently recovered the whole Province. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the *Dardani*ans gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdome; wasting and spoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all haste of 6000. Foot, and 500. horse: wherewith coming upon them, he drave them, with little or no losse of his own, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise he had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yeeld unto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limnius and Demophilus with with Cycliadas the banished Achean, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors unto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, which Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seems that they had Commission, to refer all unto Titus his own discretion; as Philip himself in few daies after did. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteen daies: in which time, the King himself might come and speak with the Roman Generall. In the mean season, many suspicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chief authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honesty, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters unto his Associates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the treaty should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entred into consultation before the kings arrival, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every state in particular. The poor king Aminander besought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would think upon him; and, considering his weakness which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus so much as he had thus assembled the 20 Confederates to advise upon their own good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the main of the purpose which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither allure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the war, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the fair promises made by Titus himself unto the Greeks, than the chasing of Philip quite out of his kingdom. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable customs which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seek the utter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made war with them; untill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was onely an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece, it was (he said) expedient, that the kingdom of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be utterly destroyed: forasmuch as it served as a bar to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other salvage Nations, which would soon overflow the whole continent of Greece, if this kingdom were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld unto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reason to deny him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their own pleasure, to take counsell apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Ætolians, to say, that all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no lesse than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bade him leave his babblings; saying, That himself would take such order, as that Philip, were he never so desirous, should thenceforth not have it in his power to molest the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus used friendly: and suffering him to repose himself that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded unto all that had bin required at his hands; offering yet further to stand to the 50 good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Ætolian, insulting over him, said, It was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Ætolians a many of Towns, (which he there named) bidding him speak whether he would or no. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himself, said it should be otherwise. These were Thessalian Towns, and should be all free: one of them onely excepted, which not long ago had refused to commit it self to the faith of the Romans, & therefore should now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the

Towns

Towns that had sometime belonged unto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing save the pillage and captives. It is true, that there had been such a condition in the former war: but it ceased to be of any validity, as soon as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to understand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by compulsion, should be delivered into subjection of the Ætolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted with these angry passages between the Romans and the Ætolians: neither had they great reason to fear any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalf of those Thessalians, to give them liberty, though they had stood out against him, even till very fear made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gave their consent willingly unto a Truce for four Moneths.

The chief cause that moved Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonians, besides that laudable custom by him before alledged, was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an army from Syria, and drawing neer toward Europe. He had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the war should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry 10 States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alledging frivolous matter of their own suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the war. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to whatsoever was demanded; and the letters of Titus, pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side, and the importunity of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shews were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as soon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People; by whose sovereign authority it was concluded, that peace should be granted to the King. So ten Embassadors were sent from Rome, over unto Greece: in which number were they that had been Consuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, that Titus should go through with the business of Peace. These would very faine have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, untill the estate of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally, Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered unto the Acheans; and all the other Greek towns which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored unto liberty.

The Conditions of the Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next * Isthmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greek * Except. & Pol. Legat. 5. towns which he held, and confine them over to the Romans: That he should deliver 40 up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his ships of war, reserving to himself only five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatness, wherein sixteen men laboured at every oare: Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one half in hand, the other in ten years following, by even portions. Hereto * Livie adds, That he was forbidden to make war out of Macedon, with- 50 out permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he observed this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already delivered to Titus, together with his younger son Demetrius, to remain as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his son, should be restored back unto him, 50 if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who, together with those four hundred talents, was given for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus unto Prusias King of Bithynia: giving him to understand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalf of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian his son-in-law, should be restored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did.

did. What effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly material; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise, that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselves aggrieved that they were utterly neglected: which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Ætolians continued to favour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who, seeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne unto him; unless at this time, when he lay close by them with his Army, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to have a hand in the execution, yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans: in such wise, that howsoever they durst not take Arms against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the country. This was detested within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Ætolians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred souldiers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadours to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amiss, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he falls to wasting their country; and besiegeth two such towns of theirs, as did seem to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Acheans and Athenians (especially of the Acheans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this war; yet belought him rather to grant peace unto the Ætolians) prevailed so far with him, that he was pacified with 30. talents, and the punishment of such as were known offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoicing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prove a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keep in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greeks, conceive, that this Macedonian war served as an introduction to the war to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were never without great solemnity and concourse; Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the General, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at liberty, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Laws, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubæans, Acheans of Phthiotis, Magneſians, Theſſalians, and Peræthebians. The suddenness of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout, yet presently they cried out to hear it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own ears. The Greeks were Craft-masters in the Art of giving thanks, which they rendered now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-near smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more available unto the Romans so in their war against Antiochus, than could have been the possession of a few Towns, yea, or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gave audience to Hagesianax and Lysias, king Antiochus's Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie unto their Lord, That he should do well to abstain from the free cities in Asia, and not vex them with war: as also to restore whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolemy or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe over his Army into Europe; adding, adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talk with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greeks; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wisdom to offend overmuch, being shortly to take a greater work in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis they annexed unto the Theſſalians; all save the town of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharſalus and Lencas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howsoever somewhat the Councell might favour them, yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Heræa. So the Corinthians were made free indeed, (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achean common-wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute manner as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this war; to reign in them, and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodian had been their own Carvers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would have given the towns of Oreum and Eretria, in the Isle of Eubæa, to his son and successor King Enmenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubæans, should be suffered to enjoy their liberty. Orestis, a little Province of the kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded unto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at liberty, and made a free estate by it self.

These businesses being dispatcht, it remained, that all care should be used, not how to avoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadours were sent, both to Antiochus himself, to pick matter of quarrell; and about unto others, to pre-dispose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War against this King, the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I refer unto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

§. I.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomie reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slain by Ptolemy Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; having (as is said) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I never have read that any mans life hath been preserved, or any mischance avoided by the predictions of such Divellish Oracles. Rather I beleeve, that many such predictions of the Heathen gods, have been ante-dated by their Priests; or by others, which deviled them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the son and heir of this Seleucus, was dearly beloved of his father: who surrendred unto him his own wife Stratonice, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemy Ceraunus had great cause to fear, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevengeed by this his Successour. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words, containing himself within Asia; and letting Ceraunus enjoy that quietly, which he

he had purchased in Europe, with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his fathers life, yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that revenge; whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had wars with Antigonus Gonatus, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Alfo Lutarus and Leonortus, Kings or Captains of the Gauls, were set upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battell: wherein, though otherwise the enemies had all advantage against him, yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their horses and them, he won the victory. He took in hand an enterprise against Ptolomy Philadelphus: but finding ill success in the beginning, he soon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his History of Assyria; the same which hath since been excellently falsified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one son, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twenty and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeer of the Kingdom of the Greeks, when he had reigned nineteen yeers.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vain and impious title given to him, by flattery of the Milesians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitlesse war with Ptolomy Philadelphus 20 King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomy.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierom and other Interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolomy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own sister Arifnoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worthiest of all that race. It was he that built, and furnished with Books, that famous Library in Alexandria: which to adorn, and to honour the more, he sent unto Elezar, then high Priest of the Jews, for the Books of Moses and other Scriptures. The 30 benefits of this King unto the Jews had formerly been very great: for he had set at liberty as many of them, as his father held in slavery throughout all Egypt; and he had sent unto the * Temple of God in Jerusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Elezar, yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew copie: which Ptolomy caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72 Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy, Jesus the son of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to have been one: who that he lived in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Jansenius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the high Priest, was written (as * Josephus affirms) by Aristus 40 that was employed therein. Forty yeers Ptolomy Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had been in his former yeers: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been referred unto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: otherwise, the Gout, with which he was often troubled, was enough to reach him his own error. He was the first of the Kings, derived from Alexanders Successors, that entered into League with the Romans: as also his off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted up.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomy. After his second marriage, he used his first wife with no better regard, than if she had been his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet adventurous not to seek revenge, until her own son Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three yeers after the death of Ptolomy Philadelphus: at what time the poisoned her husband Theos; and, by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered 50

Concerning that Book which now goes under the name of Arifcus; many learned men, & among the rest, Lodovick Vives, hold opinion that it is counterfeit; & the invention of some late Author. Surely if it were to be suspected in no better regard, than if she had been his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet adventurous not to seek revenge, until her own son Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three yeers after the death of Ptolomy Philadelphus: at what time the poisoned her husband Theos; and, by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered

Berenice, together with a sonne that she had borne to Antiochus. Justine reports, that Berenice saved her selfe, together with the young Prince her childe, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne; and that not only some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolomy Evergetes, King of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Army; though too late, for she was slaine before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding unto his Father, that had fifteen yeeres beene King, began his reign. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature, which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would have beene much endangered, if Ptolomy Evergetes, who came against him, 10 had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolomy, in defence of their owne King: but rather they sided with the Egyptians, who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domestick troubles which recalled Evergetes home into Egypt, went about a dangerous piece of worke, even to make Warre upon his owne subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bin much better, by well deserving, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarked himselfe; and putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as devoured all save himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than this naked body, turned nevertheless to his great good, as anon after it seemed. For when his subjects understood in what sort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, presuming that he would thenceforth become a new man, offered unto him their service with great alacrity. This revived him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptians, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Ptolomy in a great battell: whence he escaped hardly, no better attended, than after his late shipwrecke. Having returned back to Antioch, and fearing that the enemy would soone be at his heeles; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising; 30 in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen yeeres old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee levied a mighty Army of the Gauls; wherewith he set forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolomy being advertised; and having no desire to put himselfe in danger more then he needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian War, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, 40 and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saved himselfe with so few about him, that he was verily supposed to have perished in the battell. Thus did Gods Justice take revenge of those murders by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might have beene thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby he had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder then hee. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsell against him, and devised how to stripe him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of 50 the Royall house to make head against them, it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus, and enforced him to ransom himselfe with money, as if he had beene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to try his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profite of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvel, since he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gauls, his own souldiers, than

than of the enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia; whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawk, (which surname was given him, because he fought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) soared away as far as he could, both from his brother, and from his own Gaules. Having fetcht a great compassse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew: but with a meaning to betray him. This he soon perceived: and therefore betook him to his wings again; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himself upon Ptolemy; his own conscience telling him, what evill he had meant unto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close prison: whence though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of thieves, by whom he was murdered. Near about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arjaces founder of the Parthian Kingdom: where, in his evill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arjaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his neck by a fall from his horse, and so ended his unhappy reign of twenty years. He had to wife Laodice the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captains: which was father unto that Achaus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became shortly after (as he stiled himself) a King; though, rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sons; Seleucus the third, surnamed Cerannus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Cerannus reigned only three years; in which time he made War upon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weak of body through sickness, and in want of money, he could not keep his men of War in good order: and finally he was slain by treason of Nicanor and Apaturus a Gaul. His death was revenged by Achaus, who slew the Traitors, and took charge of the Army: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while, Antiochus the brother of Seleucus being a Child.

S. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reign. Of Ptolemy Euergetes, and Philopater, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopater. The rebellion of Molo: an expedition of Antiochus against him. The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian war: with the passages between the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemy, and peace concluded. Of Achaus, and his rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fifteen years old, when he began his reign, which lasted sixe and thirty years. In his minority, he was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful servants. This vile quality in a Counsellor of such great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himself; the successe of things will shortly discover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his reign, Ptolemy Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heir Ptolemy Philopater, a young Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere been remembered. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus & the Achaens, who afterwards took part with Cleomenes; & lovingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies, and the last good king of that race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoils which he brought home, after his victories

Stories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jews, for that Omius their high Priest, out of meer covetousness of money, refused to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the widome of Josaphus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farm the Tributes and customes that belonged unto him in those parts of Syria which he held. For Celestisria, with Palastina, and all those parts of the Country that lay nearest unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians, either as having fallen to the share of Ptolemy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slain in the battell at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and unhappy reign of Seleucus Cakinius. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages between the Ptolemies and the Seleucide; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemy Euergetes reigned six & twenty years, and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seem by that which we find in the Prologue unto Jesús the son of Syrach his book, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Syrachides there saith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty years were the years of Jesús his own age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jews did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto war against the Egyptians; for the recovery of Celestisria and the Countries adjoining. This counsell was very unseasonably given, when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himself absolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheless Hermias, being more forward than wise, maintained stiffly, that it was most expedient and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captains that were faithful; whilst he in person made War upon one that was like himself, a King. No man durst gain-say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenatas an Achaen, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebel; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Celestisria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so over the Deserts into the Vally of Masias, between the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodoros an Etolian, that served under Ptolemy. So he consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came news, that Xenatas, his Captain, was destroyed with his whole Army; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst he was yet on his journey, and drew near to the River of Tygris; received many advertisements, by such assisted over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wils drawn by their Commander to bear arms against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himself stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to pass the River by Boats in face of his enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Camp; and with all the flour of his Army went over Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not so be stopped, He himself dislodged, and took his journey towards Medin; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his own souldiers; or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy; the great folly of Xenatas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatas, having born himself proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now presume that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Camp: or rather he commanded them so to do, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish up themselves against the journey, which he intended to take the next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily return the same night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heavy with the Wine and other good cheer that they had spent at supper. So Xenias and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Camp: the rest were slaughtered without making resistance; and many of them ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Camp on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to save their own lives. In the heat of this victory, the Rebells marched unto Seleucia, which he presently took: and, mastering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Countrey down to the red Sea, or Bay of Persia. He hasted unto Susa; where at his first coming, he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this business.

The report of these things coming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Massyas, filled him with great sorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took counsell what to do in this needfull case; and was well advised by Epigenes, the best man of War he had about him, to let alone this enterprise of Calasyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counsell was put in execution with all convenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soon after slain, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to hear good counsell given contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any oddes which he had of the Rebells strength. Molo distrusted his own followers: and thought, that neither his late good success, nor any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to return back to his Camp: which by some error, took alarm at his return; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in fight. The King was thus forward in giving battell to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this belief. For not a few men or Engines: but all the left wing of the enemy which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had fight of the Kings person; and were ready to do him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the victory: but Molo thorned the work, by killing himself; as did also divers of his friends, who for fear of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their own swords.

After this Victory came joyfull newes, that the Queen Laodice daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a son. Fortune seemed bountifull unto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what use he could of her friendly disposition while it lasted. Being now in the Eastern parts of his kingdom, He judged it convenient to visit his frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counsellor Hermias gave assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himself. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualty: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthening his own Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greatest part of his kingdom situate between the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearfull; and therefore yeelded unto whatsoever conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus believed this as having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring for fear of him to utter his suspicions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight, a good way out of the Camp, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to have used so much art in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoever he seemed gracious whilst he was alive: yet they that for fear had been most obsequious to him him, whilst he was in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speak of him as he had deserved, when once they were secure of him: yea, his wife and children, lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wives and children of the Citizens; whole indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achans (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to set a Diademe upon his own head, and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and study to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange that Antiochus neither went against Achans; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote unto him, signifying that he knew all, and upbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these means he emboldned the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Calasyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemy Philpater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong City near to the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemy Evergetes having lately won it, might if it had pleased him, have changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endless memoriall unto their names, by works proceeding rather from their greatness, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the same greatness hath continuance. Theodorus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himself to Antiochus, and defended Calasyria in the behalf of Ptolemy, was now grown sorry that he had used so much faith & diligence, in service of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his own profit: which thinking to find greater, by applying himself unto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two Kings; he offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrrus and Ptolemais. Whilst he was devising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captains, that was more faithfull than himself. But Antiochus halting to his rescue, vanquished this Captain who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not only of Tyrrus and Ptolemais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens: but of so many other Towns in that Countrey, as emboldned him to think upon making a journey into Egypt itself. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemy himself being loth to have his pleasures interrupted, with business of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdom. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be for the War: and nevertheless at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heat of this business, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the usuall courtisie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius: who intreated them to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the War: wherein these two Counsellors perwaded themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their own; if they could get for money, a sufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gave the readier belief, not only for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemy, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, coming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one manner, as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocles: & his fellow: Antiochus therefore having wearied himself, at the long siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win: and being desirous to refresh himself and his Army in Seleucia, during the winter which then came on; granted to the Egyptian a Truce for four moneths, with promise that he would be ready to hearken unto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would faine have seemed, but only to lull his enemies asleep, whilst he took time to refresh himself, and to bring Achaus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, He used himself, as presuming, that when time of the year better served, little force would be needfull; for that the Towns would voluntarily yeeld unto him, since Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Nevertheless, he gave audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himself well, to dispute about the justice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Selenus his Ancestor, and Ptolemy the son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Selenus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battell at Ipsus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said that Ptolemy the son of Lagi, had won Calefryia, and the Provinces adjoining, for himself: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Selenus, by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countreies about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace, they were in the end of their disposition, as far from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his own: Also Ptolemy would needs have Achaus comprehended in the League between them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deal so with another, as to take his rebell unto protection, and seek to joyn him in Confederacy with his own Sovereign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Ptolemy, with a very puissant Army, was coming up against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Captains of Ptolemy, that had resisted him the year before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence nevertheless he drave them: and proceeding onward in his journey, won so many places, that he greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew near together: many Captains of Ptolemy forsook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battell was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers, (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls;) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemy, with Arifnoe his Sister and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the brave deeds of his Ancestors, as not having of their own, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants, as also his being of Asia, had they been fewer, would have beaten those of Affrick. Wherefore by the advantage of those beasts, He drave the Enemies before him, in that part of the battell wherein he fought himself. But Ptolemy had the better men by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his enemies battell, and won the victory; whilst Antiochus was headlessly following upon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above seventy thousand foot, and six thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not four hundred horse; yet the same of his overthrow took from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in fear, lest Ptolemy and Achaus, setting upon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian, to treat of peace; which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemy to vex himself thus with the tedious businesse of War. So Ptolemy having staid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his Subjects and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achaus was not comprised in the league between these two Kings: or if he had been

been included therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the pains, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himself strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deal with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: for besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, he had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of war, and commanded a strong Army. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebelle had been, one of mean regard otherwise, and carryed beyond himself by apprehending the vantage of some opportunity: but Cousin-german to the King, as hath been shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queen, Antiochus his wife. These things had added Majesty unto him, and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemy of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battell at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell between sons-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not only slothfull, but hindered by a rebellion of his own subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemy, contrary to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serve in the late expedition; began to entertain a good opinion of their own valour, thinking it not intierior to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they less esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenary Greeks; which had hitherto kept them in straight subjection. Thus brake out a war between the King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemy thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have been spent, as he thought, much better in revelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achaus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of war against Achaus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebelle, and find him work on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent up Achaus into the City of Sardes; where he held him about two years besieged. The City was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second year came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first years siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Town. The Castle it self was upon a very high rock, and in a manner impregnable; as also the Town-wall adjoining to the Castle, in that part which was called the Same, was in like manner situate upon steep Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hung over a deep bottom, whereinto the dead carcasses of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, used to be thrown. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, used to flye up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himself, and concluded that those parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his judgement, and gave unto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived; and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and whilst a generall assault was made, entred the town in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Craesus thought himself secure on that side. But the Citizens took not warning by the example of a losse many ages past: and therefore out of memory, Achaus held still the Castle: which not only seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries, & manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it: having none other hope to prevail, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the usuall tediousnesse of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians

Arrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, upon which they still incroached. But he thought it not safe, to let Achæus break loose again. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemy the Egyptian, and good friends unto Achæus; that made it their whole study, how to deliver this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appear in the Countries under Taurus, he would soon have an Army at command, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to work as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolus a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the waies in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rocks, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Ptolemy, as well as of Achæus; to do his best for performance of their desire. He undertook the business, and gave such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus, by one Arianus, a trusty messenger, whom Bolus found means to convey into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They also wrote unto him in privie Characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none save he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, he was a trusty fellow, and one whom Achæus found by examination, heartily affected unto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, that he should be confident in the faith of Bolus, and of one Cambylus whom Bolus had won unto the business, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknown: and Cambylus was a fol ower of Antiochus; under whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Castle of Sardes. Never theless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himself to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolus himself should come speak with Achæus, and conduct him forth: there was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, save only by Bolus and Cambylus, which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrymen, * some few excepted, have been, and still are,) false knaves. These two held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose deliverance they undertook, nor touching the discharge of their own faith; but only how to get most with least ado and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share between them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveal the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Achæus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatness of such a service, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no less glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolus. At length when all things were in readines on both sides, and that Bolus with Arianus was to get up into the Castle, and convey Achæus thence: He first went with Cambylus to speak with the King, who gave him very private audience; and confirmed unto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberrall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithful unto Ptolemy, whom he had long served, he accompanied Arianus up into the Castle. At his coming thither, he was lovingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the business in hand. But he discoursed so well, and with such gravity, that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or judgement. He was an old Souldier, had long been a Captain under Ptolemy, and did not thrust himself into this business, but was invited by honourable and faithful men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countryman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times given safe passage and repassage unto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred up some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and said, that he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolus three or four of his friends; from whom when he received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himself. Hereby he took order, not to commit himself wholly unto the faith of a man unknown. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he played the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, that he had to do with one, whose knavery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolus and Cambylus had laid their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; & Bolus following behind, should have an eye upon Achæus to prevent him, not only from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his own neck, or otherwise killing himself: to the end that being taken alive, he might be so Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following as the way served, and Bolus in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Laedice; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed four of his special friends to bear him company. They were all disguised: and one of them alone took upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongue, speaking and answering as need should require for all as if the rest had been Barbarians. Bolus followed them, craftily devising upon his business, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischief of another; yet could he not see in the dark, or know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himself were there. The way was very uneasy, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were fain to stay in divers places, and help one another up or down. But upon every occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gave Bolus to understand, that he was the man: and so by their unseasonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolus whistled, and presently clasped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stir: So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus; who sat up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound unto him, did astonish the King that he was unable to speak a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes, assembling his friends together, he condemned Achæus to a cruel death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the general regard of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him these tears: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischievous knaves against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverb, A un traidor dos allevoslos. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment upon those which held the castle, that after a while they gave up the place and themselves unto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

* Among these few I do not except one, calling himself Nudemon. John Andrew Cretan, who in one of his late shameful Lies, wherein he traduced our King, Religion, & Countrey, with all the good and worthy men of whom he could learn the names, hath by inserting my name twice believed me in calling me a Parthian, and one that hath been dangerous unto my Sovereign. It is an honour to be ill spoken of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons, and Archtreacheries. Lies in regard whereof I may not deny him the commendation of Cretical time no less voluminous, than he in multiplicity of names beyond any the Cretians in elder times, that were always *Liar*s, evil hearts, and slow bellies. as Polybius l. 8.

40 Some years passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subject unto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus; under whose posterity they continued untill the Reign of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenant of the Syrian Kings. The lustful insolency of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slain by the Gauls; did stir up Asiaces, a noble man of the Country, to seek revenge of injuries done, and so animate them to rebell. So he slew the Kings Lieutenant; made himself king of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and took Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battell, whom he royally entertained and dismissed. Hereby he won reputation as a lawful king; and by good government of his Countrey, procured unto himself such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his successours, like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled, though these at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucide beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that they durst not meet him in plain field; but kept themselves in woods or places of strength, and defended the Straights and passages of mountains. The resistances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well forced, as he needed not to turn out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Straights between their mountains; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behind, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often employ against his light armature: wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Arfaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad waies and Defarts would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: He caused the Wells and Springs in the Wilderness, through which his Enemy must pass, to be dammed up and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himself out of the way; suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein without some victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arfaces was nothing strongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where he won Tambrace, the chief City of that Province. This indignity and many other losses, caused Arfaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battell. The issue thereof was such as gave together of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arfaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiss, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but having gotten the Kingdom from those that had rebelled, kept it himself. With Euthydemus he fought a battell by the River Arins, where he had the victory. But the victory was not so greatly to his honour, as was the testimony which he gave of his own private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Army. His horse was slain under him; and he himself received a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himself back unto the furthestmost parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the War, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjustly usurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had won it from the children of the Usurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, save by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should join, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his own weariness, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the son of Euthydemus, being a goodly gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embassador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little available unto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage, one of his own daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdome, causing him nevertheless to deliver up all his Elephants; as also to bind himself by oath, to such Covenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophaganeus, King of the Indians, the society that had been between their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Emenes in his War against Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was overbusied in a great civil War: then did one Sandroccottus, an Indian, stir up his Country men to rebellion; making himself their Captain, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he soon changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Majesty of a King. Finally he got unto himself (having an Army of six hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had bin Alexanders. In this estate he had well confirmed himself, ere Selenus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himself at the coming of Selenus: but met him in the field, as ready to defend his own, so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdoms, was continued by some Offices of love between their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian king, to an hundred & fifty: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted these two great kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards in many generations, any business worthy of remembrance with the western countries. The posterity of Sandroccottus is thought to have retained that kingdome unto the dayes of Augustus Caesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with presents, and an Epistle written in Greek, wherein among other things, he said, That he had command over six hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundry Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome in divers Ages, even unto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophaganeus carried himself as the worthier person, receiving Presents, and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Asia, but on the luther side of Taurus, humbled themselves unto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his own greatness within few years ensuing, by presuming to stand upon points with the Romans; whose Greatness was the same in deed, that his was only in seeming.

§. III.

The lewd reign of Ptolemy Philopater in Egypt: with the tragickall end of his favorites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolemy Epiphanes, the son of Philopater. His irresolution in preparing for drivers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellspont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings against the Hellspont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

His expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himself a while; and study which way to convert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolemy Philopater died: leaving his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; unlikely by him to be well defended against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolemy furnished Philopater, then is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that surname given him in meer derision; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years being newly past, his childhood when he began to reign, may seem to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastliness of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any mischief, whereof he could be accused. Having won the battell at Raphiah, He gave himself over to sensuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation He murdered his own wife and sister; which had adventured her self with him, in that only dangerous action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthe a filthy bawd that was no other unto them both. So these three governed the Realm at their pleasure, to the great grief of all the Countrey, till Philopater died: who having reigned seven years, left none other son than Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, begotten on Asinoe that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death Agathocles began to take upon him, as protector of young Epiphanes, and Governor of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the kings ordinary forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemy the first, and and would not be accounted Egyptians, as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth unto them his sister Agathoclea, with the young King in her armes; began a solemn oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his sister, but unto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the kingdom did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithful, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to let the Diadem upon his owne head, being a mere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake, but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was to take so much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake up the Assembly: he that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly been his manner, by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious Mis-governours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with feare of harme, which in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe unto the Citie. For he was thought a man most unapt for Government, as afterwards he proved, yet no bad Souldier, and well beloved of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people, so by the remedy which Agathocles used, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uproare. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; & delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldier was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his appaerell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought forth, and all things even in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought unto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome, leaving Moeragenes the Souldier alone by himselfe, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conveighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians of whom he found some in a Temple there by at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turkes Fanizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus bene used, they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leave him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the City, with lowd clamours, made no lesse ado than the Souldiers, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter stayed in the Court, untill the King was taken from them, and they, by his permission which he easily gave, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked up and downe the streets; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, served well to stir up King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make war upon young Ptolemy. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to see what part he could of the childes estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemy Philopater in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Egyptians addrested themselves, and craved helpe against these two kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into covenant to divide betwene them all

all that belonged unto this Orphan; whose Father had been Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of * Isid. lib. 30.
Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; He was very soon found busted, with war at his own doors. Alfo Scopas the Asolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptians, was sent into Greece to raise an Army of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I do not finde: and therefore think it not improbable, that he was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the War with Philip, as hath been shewed before. As for Scopas; he shortly after went up into Syria with his Army: where winning in many places, among the rest of his Aids, he subdued the Jewes; who seem to have yielded themselves, a little before unto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his War, & despaired of receiving help from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next year following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same year that Philip was beaten at Cynosephala, Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battail, and recovered all that had been lost. Among the rest the Jewes with great willingness returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did feare to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his own in marriage unto Ptolemy: either hoping, as may seem, that the Countrey would willingly submit it self unto him; if this young child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Western parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held over-laboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels between Antalus, Philip and the Greeks, promised to afford him great advantage, if he should bring his Army to the Hellspont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath been declared, seemed easily to be swallowed up at once. Oe while therefore he took what he could get in Syria: where all were willing to yield him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make invasion upon Antalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be persuaded by the Roman Embassadors, and desisted from that entreprife. Having thus far gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amity betwene him and them. It is not lightly to be overpassed, That these his Embassadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their own intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great wars at once. Wherefore, not standing much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour, they were content to give good words for the present. In the mean time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to win some Towns elsewhere, belonging unto Ptolemy; yet what he sends an Army Westward, intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution. How notwithstanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemy, and another to Eumenes the son of Attalus; newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when he sought to make each of them a spoile.
Thus was he acting and deliberating at once, being carried with an inexpressible desire of repugnancies, which is a disease of great, and overwilling fortunes. How ever it was,
He sent an Army to Sardes by Land, under two of his sons: willing them there to stay for him; whilest he himselfe with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to pass along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as he held for the Egyptian. It was a notable act of the Rhodians, that, whilest the war of Philip lay yet upon their hands, they adventured upon this great Antiochus. They sent unto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gave him to understand, That if he passed forward beyond a certain Promontory in Cilicia, they would meet him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs unto him; but because he should not joyn with Philip their enemy, and help him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits unto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gave a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Em-badours;

fadors; partly unto their whole city, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them: & wiled them not to be afraid, lest his coming should tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proof, than the entertainment and answer by them newly given to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appear to have been a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit, when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian war was ended at the battail of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turn would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still, unless the towns on the South coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemy their friend and Confederate were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well, for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore in this time of necessity, gave what aid they could unto all the subjects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the son of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, between Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters upon him in marriage: He excused himself, and would not have her. Attalus and Philetaerus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he said, that by abstaining from this affinity, it should be in his power to joyn with the Romans, and strengthen himself greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an over-mighty neighbour, if he hapned to win the victory.

Antiochus himself wintred about Ephesus; where he took such order as he thought convenient for reducing of Smyrna and Lampsaenus to obedience; that had usurped their liberty, and obstinately strove to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed unto the Hellespont: where having won some Towns that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed over into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lyfimachia: which the Thracians had gotten & destroyed, when Philip withdrew his garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman war. The Etolians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lyfimachia, by thrusting therein a garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his garrison did not oppress the town but save it from the Barbarians: who took and sackt it, as soon as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such, might appear by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lyfimachia at his coming thither. For the town was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King took order to have it re-edified: as also to redeem those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Country therabouts. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants, and to replenish the City with the wonted frequency. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from coming thither to dwell by any fear of the neighbour Thracians: he took a journey in hand against those barbarous people, with the one half of his Army; leaving the other half to repair the City. These pains he took; partly in regard of the convenient situation, and former glory of Lyfimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his own honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lyfimachus; & thereby made his Kingdom of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shal dearly pay; and as after that victory against Lyfimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdom founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Country, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. III.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their war with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Etolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The war of the Romans and Achaeans with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

For the Romans, though they were unable to smother their desire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keep the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good of this intended war, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lyfimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and a helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speak for him, because the one of these Kings was held no less a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards pass between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Invasion from the Kingdom of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amity between them. This was whilst as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed into terms of woe, but more plain meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten counsellors sent from Rome, required (as he hath bin shewed before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-proffered amity, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsellors were able to inform T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seems that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progress through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, use diligence to make a party strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindfull of the business: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing in their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deal with the King about those controversies, that were between him and Ptolemy. What other private instructions Cornelius had, we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embassy. For coming to Selymbria: and there understanding that P. Philinus and L. Terentius, having bin sent by Titus, were at Lyfimachia, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsellors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesanax and Lyfias were also there: the same, who had lately brought from Titus those pre-emptory Conditions, which the Embassadors present shal expound unto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and these Romans, was in a pearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the business in hand: this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliver back unto Ptolemy those Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That he must also give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that war, wherein they had laboured so much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Army into Europe; for that other cause of his journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make war upon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That he wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith he prayed them to let him alone; even as he, without such curiosity, suffered them to do in Italy what they thought good. As for his coming over into Europe: they saw well enough what business had drawn him thither; namely the war against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging, in Thrace, & Chersonesus. Now concerning his title unto that country, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversy between him and the other Kings, had been still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had been seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindered by multiplicity of business, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this city upon one of his sons, that should reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholden unto himself, and to joyne ere long with Ptolemy, not only in friendship, but in a bond of near affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refuse it; would needs hear further, what the Embassadors of Smyrnia and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampsacus being called in, began a tale, wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans; but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators between him and them.

Thus the Treaty held some few daies, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boistrous Gale-Greeks, pretend only the goodness of their swords; nor yet over-modestly, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their justice, forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was weary of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came news, without any certain author, that Ptolemy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdom, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Country in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador both to Antiochus and to Ptolemy: which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his son Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to oversee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces he took along with him, and sailed unto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintus: whom he requested to deal with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honesty and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolemy was alive. This made him bear another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwrack, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Selencia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure as might appear, of the Roman war.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at least while not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had been sent unto the Macedonian, gave him counsell, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he advised him to do quickly, before the War brake out with Antiochus, lest otherwise he might seem, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Arms again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be satisfied with weak excuses in like manner some of the Greeks, were solicited; and particularly the Aetolians, That

That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the people of Rome. It was needles to say plainly whereto this entreaty tended: the froward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the victory, as they had been during the War. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cried out that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promised unto them: upbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not only for their victory over Philip, but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs; and then should all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate, and to chase out of their city this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his virtue against them in the Civill administration, and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject unto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they use this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should have them all to be his enemies; which being once known, He was sure to be soon accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the city, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By virtue of which Office, though he was superior unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto such an annual Magistrate, as at the years end must be accountable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Questors, or Officers of the Treasury, to come and speak with him: the proud Questor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the adverse Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greavances. But he had not to do with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Pursivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique assembly of the people. There he not only shewed what the undutifull stubbornness of this Questor had been; but how unsufferable the insolency of all the Judges at the present was: whose unbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from year to year, and no one man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been passed, before he passed over Iberus: it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto necessity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to levie by Taxation laid upon the whole Commonalty, as wanting money in their publique Treasury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needfull charges. Hannibal considering this, began to examine the publique Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasury, by wayes and means whatsoever; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasury: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their own use, were thereby faine to load the people with needles burdens. Hereof he made such plain demonstration, That these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knavery: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessity of making such poor shifts, as formerly they had used, when they knew not the value of their own Estate. But as the virtue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace untill now, little regarded him, began to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods and employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong again, and Hannibal would shortly be in arms. Questionless, if oppressing the City by injustice, and robbing the Treasury, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That having done their best already to keep all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of War. But having none other matter to allege, than their own inventions: they said, That Hannibal was like unto a wilde beast, which would never be tamed: That secret messages past between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleness, as if it were harmful to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their letters cravily, every one to the best of his own friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither public notice of their Conspiracy was taken at Carthage; nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Only P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by laboring or countenancing false witnesses against him; the man, against whom in war they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal, and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadors they sent over to Carthage, G. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espial upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight; but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Having openly shewed himself, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Town when it began to wax dark, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horfes to be in a readines at a certain place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own by the Sea-side. There had he a ship furnished with all things needfull; as having long expected the necessity of some such journey. So hee bade Africk farewell, lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his owne. Passing over to the Ile of Cercina: He found there in the Haven some Merchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectively: and the chief among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. He said, He went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Island to make a sacrifice; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore he would needs hold his Feast upon the shore; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their sails and yards to be used in stead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleep: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadour: neither could they, without some loss of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied a while in fixing their tackle. At Carthage, the mis of so great a person was diversely continued. Some ghesied aright, that he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had been seen: and then the Roman Embassadors, having noie other errand thither, accused him (with an evill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; missing the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that he fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his son in Daphne: who friendly welcomed med him, and sent him unto his Father at Ephesus; that exceedingly rejoiced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorry; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Country. For it would not prove alike easie unto this great Commander to make stout Souldiers of base Astiques, as it had been by his training and discipline, to make very serviceable and skilfull men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardy, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would be far more powerfull in making unprofitable the virtue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him less careful to avoid the war; then should it further serve, to justify the Romans in their quarrell. And it seems indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making war. For Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Arms; unless by meer violence he were thereto enforced. Only the Ætolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore profiting with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsailers, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should ask. But this promise was too large, and unadvised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: so otherwise than by speaking such words as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome was of war with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Ætolians were wont to upbraid the rest of the Greeks with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliverers had laid heavier fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus to take from the legs of the Greeks their chain, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accomplishment of that which was laid upon him: all the Towns of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Country at peace, both with the Romans, and within itself. As for Antiochus; He made it his daily suit, That the Peace between him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed; and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Nevertheless, T. Quintius would needs fear that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize upon Greece, as soon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, he retained still in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrius, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Towns, he might the better withstand the dangerous Invasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable unto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embassadors, that had ben sent over to assist him; when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they said, would questionless fall upon Greece: wherein he should find not only the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was far away in Syria; and not intensive to his business. These reports went not only current through the City, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be General in the War, against the King and his

Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the business with Nabis was referred unto Titus; to deal with him as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also he knew that many of the Greeks would not be sorry; though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entered into friendship with him, two or three years before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had war with Philip: and had further been contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achaens; neither since that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw upon himself this War. He was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achaens; as one, that besides his own wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the war with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stir them up and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than only the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble City of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken; or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themselves. The Athenian Ambassador made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could devise. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their virtues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their proposition: wherein unrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poor Associates, they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pity it was to hear, such notable virtue and high deserts ill spoken of by some: which took upon them, out of their own imagination, to foretell what harm these their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would have required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose up, and told the Athenians their own: putting them in mind of their ancient glory, in those times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generally: from which honour they were now so far fallen, that they became Parasites unto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into servitude. Then spake he against the Achaens, Clients that had been along time unto the Macedonian; and Soldiers of Philip, until they ran away from his adversity. These, he said, had gotten Corinth, and much now have war be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also be Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made war with Philip, and always been friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus contain himself, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; having been always wont to profess, That Greece could never be at liberty, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seek by this discourse of war with Nabis, than business: wherewith to find themselves occupied, that so they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should do well if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Ætolians themselves did promise, & would undertake, That they would either cause him to yield to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compel him by force of Arms, to submit himself to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at unity. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Ætolians; as did their own ravenous desire of oppressing others, and getting unto themselves, that worse would use it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoil of all; but leave the Towns and Lands in possession of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done, in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achaens, cry out upon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right; but the Ætolian themselves be enforced to keep home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Ambassadors did presently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. He cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, that the ten Ambassadors or Counsellors which had been sent unto him from Rome, to be his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedemonian war: it was very soon ended. For Titus used the help of all his confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to do with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Navie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the service: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætolians: rather to hold good fashion, and shew their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their help was required; wherof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Ætolians from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedemonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wise, began a conspiracy against the Lacedemonians that held their Town; meaning to open their gates unto the Roman. But ere Titus drew near, they were all detected and slain: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Town. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stir within the Walls: the execution done upon the first movers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assail Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedamon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom wherof since the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the war should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readines an Army of fifteen thousand, wherewith to defend himself against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his own Country; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumitted slaves, malefactors and base peasants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficial. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an assembly; and compassing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous rebellion: it seemed unto him the safest, and the mildest course, to arrest before-hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent personage; and thereby preserve not only the City and his own person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourscore of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend; nor yet break loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else do than terrify the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortal crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it self unto some poor wretches : whom he accused of a meaning to flee to the Enemy. These were only whipt through all the streets, and slain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens : He turned the more freely, all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a rally : wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Town had the better at first ; but were at length repelled with loss. Titus abode not many days before Sparta : but over-ran the Country, hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to battail. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Eumenes and the *Rhodian*s, laid siege unto Gythium, the only or principall Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Governours within the Town, equall in authority : whereof the one, either for fear, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other, finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slew the Traitor ; after whose death, he himself alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintus with part of his Army came thither to Gythium : this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the uttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might do for him, but was contented to give up the place : yet upon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the son-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he was the Government, with a thousand Souldiers, Mercenaries, and two thousand Argives : it being (as may seem) the Tyrants purpose, to relieve Gythium : which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to think upon finishing the war, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus : requesting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parke the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himself : proving, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments : whereof the sum was, That whatsoever they now did, or could object unto him, was of older date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the town of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alledged, they ought to make war upon him ; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoever, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from entering into that League with him ; which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintus was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with tyranny, & gave instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him ; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Invasion should be alledged. Whereupon he said further, That this tyrant had occupied Messene, a Town Conceded with the Romans : That he had bargained to joyn with Philip ; when he was their enemy, not only in League, but also in affinity : and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, since in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom he had long held war : it may seem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip : they were matters foregoing the League, that was made between the Romans and this tyrant ; and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it seems that Ariston, the Prætor of the Achaens, very well perceived : who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to look to much of their own justice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong ; framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his own estate, and to settle his fortunes ; whilst he might do it without hazard : alledging the examples of many tyrants that had ruled in the neighbourhood, and herein committed great outrages ; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and lived in great security, honour, and happiness, as private men. Thus they discoursed untill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos ; and requested them, to deliver unto him in writing their other demands, that he might take counsel with his friends. The issue of all was, that, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Army to lie in League all that that Winter (as there was no hope of making short work) before the City of Sparta : they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon such Conditions as Titus should think meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending, Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedæmonians to have ought to do in the Ile of Crete ; nor, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Island or elsewhere ; not to build any Town or Castle upon his own Lands ; not to keep any other shipping, than two small Barks ; besides many other troublesome injunctions ; with imposition of an hundred talents in silver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight years next ensuing. For observance of these Covenants he demanded five hostages, such as he himself should name ; and one of them to be the Tyrants own son. If it had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon justice : then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him, which he himself did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the state of their best friends in Greece ; by the extirpation of this tyranny : then should this enterprize, when once it was taken in hand, have bin prosecuted unto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held : as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themselves by the spoil of one that had not offended them ; nor pleasing to the Achaens, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus : so did it minister unto the Ætolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors : it was thought very strange, that Lacedæmon, once the most famous City among all the Greeks, was by the same Romans left in possession of a tyrant, that had usurped it but yesterday : and he therein rooted by their authority, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himself unmercifully dealt withall, by the self-same Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtful war, before the love and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But falsely had he dealt with the Macedonian : and falsely was he dealt with those, to whom he did betake himself. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him, save only that for the banished Lacedæmonians ; (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp, having among them Agæopolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a young child he was driven out by Lycurgus the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored unto their City and Estates ; but only leave required for as many of their wives, as would be contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent unto these demands : and sustained an assault or two ; hoping belike that the enemies would soon be weary. But his fearful nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yielding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hostages ; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans far more wicked than himself ; and was ready upon the first advantage, to do them all the mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard newes that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to set upon the Garrison ; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras to help the tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them jointly should set their hands to the getting of it ; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintus to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had layed hold without staying for him : and that he might the better entitle himself thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemean games, as ratifying it by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Councill of Achaia, whereby the Achaens were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse ; into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business or none wherewith to set on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassy to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet, Scipio, the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The unsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Aetolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making war. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Aetolians, and of thoroughly persuading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure unto themselves the patronage of Greece) that the good of the Country was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto itself, till occasion should be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment; either found, or at any near distance appearing, he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, which the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsel, touching the moderate use of their liberty, & the care which they ought to have of living peaceably and without faction. Lastly he gave up Acrocrinthus to the Achaïans, withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be known, what Lyers the Aetolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retain those places. With joyfull exclamations did the Greeks, certify their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had been sold into their Country by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Country before his departure was urged, left therein behind him the memory of his virtue and benefits untainted by jealousy and suspicion of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph, which was the goodliest of all that Rome had until that date beheld. Three days together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoils of a Country, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made War. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brass or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first day as Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: Some in the rude Masse unwrought, some in divers sorts of Coins, and some in Vessels of sundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were ten shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himself entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, bestowed upon him by divers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice, the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the son of King Philip, and Armenes the son of Nabis, were principal. After him followed his Army, and (which added much grace, and good liking to the shew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this triumph. He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very favourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to T. Quintus, and the ten that had bin his Counsellors, because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said unto Titus and his Associates, that they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that having waivered together, were upon equal terms of advantage; or between those that had lived alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrell. Unto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yield; and patiently endure the imposition of some Covenants, that else might seem unreasonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it usual to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But between those which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their own; and neither carry itself as superiour to the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the league and friendship that had been long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take up in them to prescribe unto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at liberty, from what cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should think fit.

Hereto Quintus answered, that since they went so dutifully to work, He would also do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to accept: Either that it should be lawful for the Romans to take part in Asia with any that would seek their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing; but a reasonable nor pertinent answer, so that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstain from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe: then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampsacus, or any other Asiaticques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make War with a King that sought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lysimachia, whereon he had of late been at so much cost; in building it up even from the foundation, and repopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been dispersed, or captive to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleged: saying, That Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans took upon them as if their cause were far the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose to let at liberty those towns which the King would oppress and hold in subjection: especially since those towns were of Greekish blood and language, and fell, in that regard, under the patronage which Rome had afforded unto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon have left Antiochus King of not many subjects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to say, That unless he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not only to protect those which relied upon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be understood) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they urged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, & were contented once again to send over F. Villius, & others that had bin already with the king at Lysimachia, by whom they might receive a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintus and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitless Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two years; or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him live in peace.

§. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Masinissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for justice in vain.

The Insubrians, Bojians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians, made often and (in a manner) continual war upon the Romans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, until such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of their Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath been already shewed; by this their fellowship in Arms, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldom afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stir alone; but that their Companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpinga, now called Lumbardy, it hath been long since rehearsed between the first and second Punic Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this war, had not been distracted by the Ligurians; that at all times made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body, well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Country was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Towns they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken or besieged. They were also very poor, and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they served excellently well to train up the Roman Souldiers to hardnes and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of War) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gauls, their neighbours and companions, partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the war which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgement: and to acknowledge no such virtue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they return to minde. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them and any of their neighbours, do use commonly this answer, It hath still been the custome for us and them, so fight one against the other.

Divers overthrows, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans; but many more, and greater, they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distress, and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Country was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Country they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make war, save on their own ground.

The Country of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their provinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an Oxe-hide: & the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For treading upon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldome did it happen that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay farthest, were not up in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hard Nation, and easily stirred up to arms; but had not much knowledge in the art of war, nor any good Captains. They wanted also (which was their principal hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldom or never provided in general for the common good of their Country; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had united themselves together, for chafing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrows: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking arms.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make evacuation of this Cholerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their wars abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Country, and used them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which which they raised upon the whole Country; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise, the Romans, using the service of their own Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little business for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much business with them. Spain was too far distant, and withal too great for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the consile that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwaies maintain such Armies in the Country, as might serve to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captains as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did; and thereby held the Country; 10 though seldom in peace.

Very soon after the departure of Scipio, there was raised War in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same general ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Wars following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while help the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians, safely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Country, being well acquainted with the manner of War in those parts, suppressed this rebellion by many victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Country: which lasted five years. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the War: yet left it still remaining the cause of the War; which after five years brake out again. The Spaniards fought a battell with the Roman Proconfull, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy success of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to send thither two Praetors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the year following, and sent into that Province, found at his coming little left to do, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the pains that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chieftest of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Country, and put him unto much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet unsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebell. He therefore disarmed them: which they took so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very grief. Hearing of this, and well understanding that such desperation might work dangerous effects; He called unto him the principall among them: and commending unto them peace and quietness, which they never had disturbed but unto their own great losse, He prayed them to devise what course might be taken for holding them assured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counsell in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kinde of Subject; He gave expresse charge, That upon a day appointed they should throw down the wals of all their Towns. Afterwards he carried the war about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countymen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a jest. That if he were vanquished and slain, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, He could pay them with the enemies money. Finally, He brought the War to good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publique Revenues in that Province, by 30 causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth by a vertue much agreeable to his own peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other useful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any business either private or publique. Many books he wrote: whereof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry: In matter of husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of mean birth, and the first of his house. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sincerity of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himself to the ancient laudable Customes of the City. Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemency of his nature had not caused him to malign the virtue of that noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himself, though far less rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, He was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himself to all occasions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved business so well, 10 rather hated vice so earnestly, that even unto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himself or accusing others. For at the age of fourscore and six years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accused Sergius Calba unto the people. So began the Nobility of Cato his family, which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the African: one that being of like vertue and fervency, had all his good purposes done, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such nobility and greatness as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Country, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Country seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prators therefore, of which two every year 20 were sent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into Governments) did rarely fail of such work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteen thousand Spaniards in a battell: another took fifty Towns; and a third enforced many States of the Country to sue for peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, towns, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slain, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to say, That the business in Spain required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, until the Numantian War broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Tonian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so 30 had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themselves and their obedient City: Masaniissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Lepcis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redress, than by sending to Rome 40 their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to allege, if the Judges had been impartial. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Country: Masaniissa himself, now very lately pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for himself to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had wherewith to justify his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent unto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. 50 This man they had examined upon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, that certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policy to keep them down.

As for the Country of Emporia: it had alwaies, he said, been theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime unto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were known, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that that whereon their City stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africa, that had gotten leave there to build upon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Oxe-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoever they held without such a compass, was purchased by fraud, and wrongful encroachments. This considered, Masaniissa requested of the Senate, that they would not adjudge unto such usurpers, the Country sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard their allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtful, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore, because they would do nothing rashly; they sent over three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African 10 was one and the chief, to decide the controversie: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Masaniissa with a strong army should quickly prevail against those that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not only from stirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had there to any disposition; but were prepared by little and little, unto their final destruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leisure to express the utmost of their hatred.

§. V I.

The Aetolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to war upon the Romans, by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gythium, and wasteth some part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace by the Romans, joyns with the Aetolians. The Aetolians surprize Demetrius; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

30 ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Aetolians to think, that they who had promised unto themselves the whole spoil of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks; were not only disappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most unregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have sufficed them, if their desires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due: as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly defeated, wherein they thought that they had unufferable wrong. Wherefore they de- 40 stituted, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what means they best might right themselves, and give the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soon agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not only perswade Antiochus to make war upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to joyn all together in a new Confederacy: whose joyned forces could not in all likelihood, but far surmount those of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodians, and King Enmenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Aetolians took in hand, and well 50 befecoming them, for they were great darters. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with perswasions, as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courtes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet shewed himself of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seek any good pretence, began immediately to lay siege unto Gythium, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affairs of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his duty: neither would they have staid long from repressing his violence by open war; had not some of them thought it wisdom to ask Counsell of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a business of such importance. Whilst thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were advised by Quintius to let all alone and to wait for the coming of the Roman forces, that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to give them juster cause of complaint, by waisting their own Territory.

Philopamen was then Pretor of the Acheans, who had long been absent in Crete, making War there for his minds sake and recreation. Unto him the Acheans referred themselves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should think best. He made all haste to relieve Gythium by Sea; fearing lest the Town, and the Achean Garrison within it, should be lost, if he used any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Sea-man, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a quadrireme Gally his Admirall, that had fourscore years agoe been counted a gallant Vessell, in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedaemonians. Only it fell out well, that he committed himself to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her talons. For his admirall Gally was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and took in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopamen was not herewith daunted. If 20 he had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the siege of Gythium, to stop the Acheans, if they should invade his Countrey. But upon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came unexpected, fired their Camp, and put all, save a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched he with all his Army towards Lacedaemon: within ten miles wherof he was when the tyrant met him, that had already taken Gythium. It was not expected that Nabis would have been ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gythium, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that he must overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long troop reaching some five miles; having their 30 Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to bear off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or travelled abroad with his friends, to mark the situation of the Countrey about him; and to discourse what might befall an Army marching the same way. He would suppose, that having with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were upon that ground encountered by a greater Army, or better prepared to the fight. Then would he put the question, Whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? What piece of ground it 40 were meet for him to seize upon; and in what manner he might best do it; in what fort he should order his men; where bestow his carriages, and under what Guard in what fort encamp himself; and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation, He was grown so perfect, that he did never meet with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himself and his followers. At this time he made a stand: and having drawn up his Rere, He encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His baggage with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rock; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook; whereto the Acheans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was first to minister the like occasion of skirmish. Philopamen understood this; and laid an ambush in place convenient; wherein to the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Acheans had a purpose to get between him and Lacedaemon; whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recovery of their freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwise would have been forced.

Some

Some companies he made to stay behind, and shew themselves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceal his departure. But Philopamen was not so to be beguiled. He easily won the Camp, and gave chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about & make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, & fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopamen conceived a right, that their fear & necessity would teach them to creep homewards, and save themselves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the evening, when he had gathered together all those of his light-armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day, he led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinary passages unto Lacedaemon. So Nabis his 10 men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopamens Camp great store of lights, thought that all had been at rest: and therefore adventured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty daies together after this, did Philopamen waite the Country round about, whilst Nabis durst not issue forth of his town; and then returned home, leaving the tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them, labouring to make their party strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Atolians. Very fair countenance they also made unto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever he thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore unto him his son: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receive other favours at their hands; and regain possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for war against Antiochus in Greece, whilst their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeeld unto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage between Ptolemy and his daughter; together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings son, which hapened during the Treaty, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King from giving audience in person to the Embassadors; caused them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their answer as at their setting forth. 30 One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficiall unto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Livie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus, upon a causeless suspicion wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captains that had lived, Hannibal judged the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third he challenged unto himself. But Scipio, who thought his own title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten, asked yet further, What wouldst thou 40 have said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my self. Now whether this were so, or otherwise, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to use his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainly desired him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; he easily recovered his former grace and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to swear at the Altars, when he was a little boy, that he never should be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vainfurnishes: but to know thus much, that so long as he thought upon war with 50 Rome, so long would Hannibal do him all good service: whereas contrariwise, if he intended to make peace, then should it behove him to use the counsell of some other man.

The Atolians, and their friends, were no less busied all this while, in making their party strong against the Romans, than were the Romans in mustering up their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting much of their own forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip, that finally they prevailed with him, especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, unless he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonians.

But

But in vain. He understood the Romans, and himself, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own forces to the uttermost: as knowing that all the burden must lie upon Antiochus and themselves, without help from any, save only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilst they were about this, and had with them an Ambassador of the King Antiochus, that animated them to resolution, the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemency a little, by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay near at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus having this, thought it a business worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himself against the Romans, it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panathenium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appeale them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaign field, on which to the ruine of the Country, the Romans and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mastery: the Ætoliens, as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becoming force. For the Towns-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their liberty, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this business was dashed. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Town, styling himself King: but more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-near lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopamen had lately given him: since he durst not stir abroad; and daily expected the mischief, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after another, to the Ætoliens; requesting them, That as he had not been slow to stir in their behalf, but adventured himself upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what help they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often said, That the ravenous Ætoliens were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise than as it might conduce to their own ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenary forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon unto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a work. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirty Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirty were by Demetrius the Prætor brought into the Councell of the

* Liv. l. 35. the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might do, to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to set the world in an uproar, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Ambassador of the King, whose help they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes unto them, to hear those comfortable words; that, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their right, or else by way of favour. For with such Terms had they been teased once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who having it in his own power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This was only loss of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intreated to come over into Greece, as well to let the Countrey at liberty, as also to decide the controversies depending between the Romans and Ætoliens. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings minde before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the river of Tiberis. Gentler words would have done better, as the Ætoliens are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go on unduly to work. The care of the war they referred unto the more private Councell of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a generall assembly. The Apocleti (so were the privie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to work as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entring some of them as friends, to conduct home a principall man of the City: who for speaking words against T. Quintinus, had been driven to flee thence; but was, by intercession of those that loved him, again re-called. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, seized upon a Gate, whereas they let in a troop which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend itself against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostility, they gave a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but only to deliver the Town from the Romans; who more insolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetorick they prevailed no more, than they could do by plain force.

* Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to think that they were sent to make war with the Acheans, or to do ought else, save only what Alexamenus should command them; which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Ætoliens, he said, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could, before the great king; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bin long pent up in the City; and train them without the walls: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field: riding up and down with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or four horse about him; from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion, to step aside alone to his Ætoliens, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned again to Nabis. But when he

40 saw time for the great work which he had in hand, he then went aside to his thirty horsemen, and bade them remember the task enjoyned them at their setting forth; telling them, that they were all in case of banished men, unless they would anon come up to him, and help him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewith all the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirty Ætoliens never stood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where in stead of seeking revenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætoliens halted into the City, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himself with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Town, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not indure to see those that had slain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the town was shortly in arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royall stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his children, whom they mounted upon a good Horse, and made him their Chief. So they fell upon the Ætoliens that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slain in keeping the Citadel: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopæmen came thither: who calling out the chief of the City, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexamenes should have done after he had slain the Tyrant, easily perswaded them for their own good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Achaans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians; and the small, but effectually, travell of Philopæmen, the Achaans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin governed either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. Sundry passages between him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the civill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achaans. That is concerned the Greeks to have desired peace between the Romans and Antiochus, as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and as Antiochus was so idle vanity, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsell in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marrieth a young wife, and revels away the rest of Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Straights of Thermopyla. He is beaten, and flees into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the victors.

A*ntiochus* was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsac, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet he was desirous, with all speed convenient, to shew himself in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, that in all the country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chain, desiring nothing more, than to break loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to confer upon him the greatness, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilest therefore the king was thinking to send Hannibal into Africa, there to molest the Romans, & so give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came over to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his countrymen had already taken Demetrias, a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatness of his vertue & fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoas was bold to tel the king, first, that it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, that in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more unfit man to be employed in the kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, that the king should as greatly feel the losse of a fleet or Army, perishing under such a notable commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner quality: whereas nevertheless if Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone should have all the honour, & not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, that such a renowned Warriour should be alwaies near unto the Kings person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good success would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the sovereign Command; even of the King himself. Antiochus gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Majesty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought upon.

Presently

Presently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a frivolous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-side to Ilium; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing over the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chief man, and ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countrymen, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and took it as a sign of good luck, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships, of which, no more than forty were serviceable for the Wars, with an Army of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and six Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his coming than they called a Parliament, and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their country. He knew before that they would so do; and was therefore well oned on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gave him as joyfull entertainment as they could devise. Being brought into their Council, he made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused; that he came not followed with a greater Army. This was, he said, in true estimation, a sign of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hastened unto their aide, even whilest the season was unfit for Navigation. Yet it should not be long ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, travel, or danger, to follow the business which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authority out of Greece; leaving the Country free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great; so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be any way burdensome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs intreat them, having thus hastily come over unto their aid, unprovided of many necessities, that they would help him with Corn and other victuals, whereof he stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) that they would yield unto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may observe, how vain a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himself, as did Antiochus, in a business of dangerous importance upon the promised assurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemency of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Council, the Ætolians, for gain of two or three Towns, yea, for hope of such gain that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their friend, unto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himself to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present, though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was chosen General of all their forces: and thirty Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Council of War for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these he hastened away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chief Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, set Greece at liberty. But such liberty as might be true and usefull, they said, would never be obtained; untill by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mighty, every severall estate had where to finde redress of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; as a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheless desired them only, so to joyn with him in League, as that if either the Romans or he should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to seek redresse at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginary, but absolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacy. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirm of all the Greeks: forasmuch as none of them paid any tribute, was kept under by any Garrison, or lived otherwise than by their own Laws, and without being tied unto conditions which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himself to deliver Cities that were already free. But since he, and the Ætolians, requested their friendship; they besought both him and the Ætolians, to do a friendly Office, in depriving from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soon after, he brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yield: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chief City of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the rest of the Island shortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over late to have defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little town of Boœtia, lying over against the Island; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated unto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, & beholding the things there to be seen, whilst others were busied as they found cause, without fear of any danger, as being in such a place, and no war hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himself in many vain Treaties of peace took advantage of their carelessness, and used them with all extremity of war. Very few of them escaped: fifty were taken, and the rest slain. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make war upon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece, in hope, that his reputation should persuade very many to take his part. The wiser sort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reserved themselves untill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, he must hold them excused for not daring to stir; or if he came, the Romans must pardon their just fear, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay far off, joyned with him in true meaning, save the Eleans: that alwaies favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achaans. Little reason there was, that he should think to draw the Achaans to his party. Nevertheless he assayed them, upon a vain hope, that the envie which Titus was said to bear unto Philopæmens vertue, had bred a secret dislike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the Ætolians sent Embassadors to the Councell at Ægium, that spured not brave words, if the Achaans would have been so taken. The Kings Embassador told of great Armies and fleets that were coming; reckoning up the Dahians, Medians, Elimeans, and Caducians; names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydæmans, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphilians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well known, that the Kingdoms of Asia had alwaies thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late war made against Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the case was too far different. Yet this most powerful King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Achaans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly look on, whilst he took order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Embassador, and further added; that in the battell at Cynosephale, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both he and his Army had bin there destroyed, had they not been protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have been desired. He told the Achaans, That neither the Kings Embassador, nor the Ætolian, did so greatly labour to persuade those unto whom they addressed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one unto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For even such brags as here they made before the Achaans, who knew them to be liars, had the Ætolians also made unto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory over Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependent on them. Interchangeably had they been feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassador told even now, of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bond-slaves, and good for little else. These divers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diversity of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vaunter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that variety, wherewith he wondered, as his Host then merrily told him, than so many pieces of one tame swine, drest after severall fashions, with variety of sauces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had notwithstanding all this great noise, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Army he was fain in a manner to beg victuals of the Ætolians; and take up money at usury, to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Countrey; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias again. There were the fruits of lies: wherewith, since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much persuasion is needful. The Achaans did not love so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred between these two Nations grew inveterate; sufficiently appears in the story foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons: the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrey at rest: there was nothing more greatly to have been desired, than that they might never find occasion to return with an Army thither again. And in this respect ought the Greeks to have fought, not how Smyrna and Lampſacus might recover their liberty (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, untill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Countrey, as two Seas by an Isthmus, or neck of land, might be kept from overflowing the bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiaticques, who originally were Greeks, than the general applause, wherewith all the nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of fear, that should move them to take arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising jointly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stir against them: then had not only this quarrell been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Countrey, had been far from growing, as soon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achaans were at this time, in a manner the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gave doubtful answers of hope unto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Boeotians willingly received him, as soon as he entred upon their borders, not so much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had been somewhat hardly used. Ammander the Atbamian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himself to be defended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sons, in that regard, Philip & Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poor Court of Athamania: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedegree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to do their best for the conquest of Macedon: in behoof: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behaved him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by persuasions of himself, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. 10 But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own phrenzies in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his subjects: or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynosephala, there to gather up the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended merely unto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans; and gave them to understand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein soever they should be pleased to use him.

The Ætolians, Magnetics, Eubæans, Boeotians, and Athamanians, having now all joyined with him; Antiochus took counsell of them about the prosecution of the War in hand. The chief question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessaly, that would not hearken to his persuasions; or whether to let all alone untill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another; confirming each his own sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long been cast aside, as a vessel of no use, but was now required to deliver his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even the same which he would have spoken, had he 30 counsell at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetics, Boeotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poor estates, that wanting force of their own, did adjoin themselves for fear unto him, that was strongest for the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same fear for their excuse? Wherefore he thought it most behoovefull to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had means to sustain the Roman War with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily persuaded to join with them, the benefit likely to redound unto himself, by their society, was a very strong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope: For, said 40 hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, this Thoas, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motives which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans; likening that King to some wild beast, that was chained or locked up within some grate, and would faine break loose. If this be so: let us break his chain, and pull down the grate, that he may regain his liberty, and satisfy his angry stomack, upon those that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his fear be greater than his indignation: then shall it behove us to look unto 50 him; that he may not seek to please his good masters the Romans, by offending us. Towson Seleucus is now at Lyfimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage, let Seleucus be in readinesse to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend his own on the other side, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarked against the Romans; I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then given ear, the Romans by this time should have heard other news; than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy & Gaul should have bin on fire with war; and little little to their comfort, they should have understood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I see what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet & Army hither (but in any case let ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of vittuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few hands, and too many mouths). Wherefore let the one half be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other half, sailing on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affairs of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice, 10 though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of war; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine own. Of this Counsell which I give, I promise you my faithfull and diligent service for the execution: but what counsell soever you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken bravely; but of all this was nothing done; save only that one was sent into Asia; to make all things ready there. In the mean while they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chief of the Country, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babine, a Roman Propretor, did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himself enemy unto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour coming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountains tops afar off; thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been coming upon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the year: He brake up his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, daughter unto a Citizen of the Town; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the winter following as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon the War in hand. His great men and Captains followed his example, and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his Army had 30 passed the winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaim them from this looseness of nuptiall Revels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica, his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far less credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had bin long since, in time of the Punic War, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate for very fear and superstition, 40 on durst not have so pronounced him, had they not thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, that none other man than the very best, should entertain an old stone, which they Devil then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own Province; or arrogate more unto himself, than his lot should afford him. This unpartial distribution of employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make War against the Bojians; wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand foot, two thousand horse, and fifteen 50 Elephants. Ptolemy King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolemy sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young and dwelt too far off. So his money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer lovingly refused. Unto Philips Embassadors answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that he should give to Antiochus the Consul. Masaniſſa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantity of grain; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masaniſſa far out-went the poor City of Carthage; as also in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertook to set out a Fleet at their own charges; and to bring in at one payment, all the Tribute-money which was behind, & ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet; nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn, it was accepted, with condition, that they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The haſty and ridiculous iſſue of this War, that began with ſuch noiſe and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman and the Aſiatic ſouldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few towns of Acarnania, after the ſame manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece, partly by fair words, and treaſon of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to prove their excuſe, when they ſhould again forſake him. But King Philip and Babius having recovered many places; and the Roman Consul being arrived, againſt whom none made reſiſtance; he was glad to withdraw himſelf. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good ſervice to the Romans. Philip the brother of Aminander's wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking-ſtock, and ſent away 20 prisoner to Rome. The Theſſalians uſed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities one after another, gave up themſelves: the Garrilſons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet ſo, that a thouſand of them ſtayed behinde, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawn himſelf to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cryed out upon his friends: and ſaid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deal of toyle during one half of a winter, and ſpent the other half in ſuch Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which in time of need, he found all the promiſes of the Ætolians merely verbal: and himſelf reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal 30 as a wife man, yea, a very Prophet, that had foreſeen all this long before. Nevertheless, He ſent word to the Ætolians, that they ſhould now make ready all their forces: as conſidering their own need to be no leſſe than his. But the Ætolians had cauſe to think, that they themſelves were ſhamefully diſappointed by Antiochus; who having promiſed to do great wonders, was in all this while ſeconded by no greater numbers out of Aſia, than ſo many as would fill up the ſame ten thouſand which he firſt brought over. Yet came there ſome of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joynd with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better ſatisfaction, than that Thous and his ſollowes had done their beſt in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came over to him out of Aſia, nor his friends of 40 Greece would appear in this time of danger: He ſeized upon the Straights of Thermopyla; as meaning to defend them againſt the Romans, untill more help ſhould come. Of the Straights of Thermopyla, there hath been ſpoken enough before, upon many occaſions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas againſt the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may eaſily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and ſo came onwards into Theſſaly, were unable to paſſe that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece; unleſſe they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of theſe, with an handful of men, defended this paſſage two or three daies together, againſt a World of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to do great miracles, and effect what he liſted himſelf in Greece: did commit himſelf un- 50 to the ſafety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his own Army. There whileſt he lay, He ſent earneſt meſſengers one after another to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forſake him thus; but at leaſt wiſe now to help, and keep the tops of the mountains, left the Romans, finding any by-path, ſhould come down upon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thouſand, that undertook to make good the few paſſages: by which only and not without extreme difficulty, it was poſſible for the Enemy to aſcend. The Roman Conſull in like ſort prepared to force the the Straights; without ſtaying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by ſickneſs from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Conſuls. Theſe he ſent forth by night with two thouſand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Ætolians. He himſelf encouraged his Army: not only by telling them with what baſe conditioned enemies they had to deal: but what rich kingdomes Antiochus held, that ſhould bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battell. All that night Cato had a ſore journey (for what hapned unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, ſave only that he failed in his intent) and ſo much the worſe, for that he had no ſkilfull guide. Seeing there- 10 fore his men exceedingly tyred, with climbing up ſleepy Rocks and crooked waies: He commanded them to reſt themſelves; whileſt he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the diſcovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himſelf. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the beſt way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men, and held on the ſame path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, becauſe in time of peace, there was a fair way through the Straights below, that required no ſuch trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopyla been ſo often the Seat of War, as might cauſe any travellers to ſearch out the paſſages of thoſe deſolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the beſt; yet did it lead 20 him to a bog at the end, which would ſuffer him to paſs no further. So he ſtaid there untill day-light: by which he diſcovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him, and ſome of the Ætolians very near unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore ſent forth a luſty Crue of his men, whom he thought fitteſt for that ſervice; and willed them by any means to get him ſome priſoners. This was effected: and he thereby underſtood, that theſe Ætolians were no more than ſix hundred; as alſo that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he preſently ſet upon the Ætolians, overthrew them, ſlew a great part of them, and chaſed the reſt, that by flying to their Camp, guided him into it. The fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had eaſily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Camp, found 30 it in a manner a deſperate piece of work to aſſault the Camp it ſelf, which occupied the whole breadth of the Straights; was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were beſt at that kinde of ſervice; but by Archers & Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill ſide, and powred down a ſhowre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at firſt that the Ætolians had been coming to help the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and enſigns were diſcovered, ſuch was the terrour, that none made offer of reſiſtance; but all of them forſook the camp, and fled. The ſlaughter was not great: for that the badneſs of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making purſuit. Yet this daies loſſe drove Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with 40

All the Cities that had imbraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and intreat for pardon: ſetting open their gates; and preſenting themſelves unto the Conſul, in manner of ſuppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians only ſtanding out, becauſe they knew not what elſe to do. Neither did the Conſul give them any reſpite. At his returne from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyne with him againſt Antiochus: over whom ſince the victory was already gotten. He did graſtulate unto the Romans their good ſucceſſe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, That the Conſul ſhould beſiege Heraclea; and Philip Lamia; 50 at the ſame time. Each of them plied his work hard; eſpecially Philip, who ſain would have taken Lamia before the Conſul ſhould come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that uſed to work by Myne, were overmuch hindered by the ſtony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Conſul, having won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the ſpoil of theſe towns was a reward unto thoſe that had fought at Thermopyla. Herewith Philip muſt be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Ætius that could ſo ill indure to ſee Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory got not Lamia himſelf: untill ſuch time as another Conſul was ready to caſe him of his charge.

The losse of Heracles did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight: intreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to return with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from coming in person, at least wife to help them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour; but appertained unto his own safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a sum of money, that might serve to defray the charges of the War: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thom, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heracles was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the help of Antiochus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtain peace, upon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience, but said, He had other business in hand; only he granted them ten daies of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himself. At their coming to Hypata, they began, as men favouring their own cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to accept pardon. Better they thought to do so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced unto terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing unto the faith, signified, in their use of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speak in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said he, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to go into Asia, upon any business private or publick: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicaarchus the Ætolian, Menesthratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countreimen as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilst he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custome of the Greeks, who had yielded themselves unto his faith, nor unto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Do ye stand to plead Custome with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chain. With that, chains were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted unto every one of their necks. This did affright them, that they stood dumb and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deal thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himself: and said, That neither he, nor yet the Apocleti or ordinary Councell for the Nation, were able to fulfill these injunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten daies respite; and had granted unto him Truce for so long.

This surceasance of War, during ten, and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had been commanded away from Lamia, that else he might have won. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this War: He was desired to set upon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilst the Consul was busie with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that he could get. And he got in that space all Athamania, Perrhabia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War; yet they could not endure to hear more talk of Peace. And it happened, that Nicanor about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with money & hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heracles & Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicanor conveyed into Lamia, by very unskillfull dexterity. But he himself being to passe further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as far as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good; but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seems, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity, of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his servants to entreat Nicanor friendly; and he himself being then at supper, did visit him as soon as he rose up: giving him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madnesse, forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus; but himself, being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, wherof hitherto they never made any trial: for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signify unto his Countreimen; and privately to hold in mind the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giving him a Compy to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicanor was always after dutifully affected to the crown of Macedon: so as in the war of Perseus he made himself suspected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: he forthwith meant to prosecute the war against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Nau-pactus: whither he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Nau-pactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Achilles stood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have been a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So he staid there well-near all the following time of his Consulship; whilst the Macedonian king and the Acheans made far better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong City of Demetrias, and with an hasty course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Acheans called to account the Eleans and Messenians: which had long been addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble a while. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other help when the Achean Prætor wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that unto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yield. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Army, and finish the War: as also the peremptory Command of the same Titus, caused the Messenians to annex themselves unto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-wealth. Such was now the Majesty of a Roman Embassador. Titus did favour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their liberty, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords; and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms, it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus; which had once bin Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who sent a Governor thither. But when Aminander in this present war, was driven out of his own Kingdome by Philip; then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Ile to the Acheans; whom he thought ready Chappmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victory which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achaens referred themselves unto his discretion. So he told them, that their Commonwealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell; and that, holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having said these things thus in Peloponnesus, he went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had lain two months, that might have been far better spent. There, whether out of compassion which he had upon the Ætolians, or out of dislike of King Philip thriving so fast: he persuaded the Consul to grant unto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; 10 and submitting themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Ætolians have made such earnest suit as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had bin sure to carry it in any short space, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it, since the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole flour of the Nation, would have made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could help them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly submit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate, Or else pay a thousand talents, and make neither peace nor war with any further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much money: neither could they well hope to be 20 gently dealt withall, if they should give themselves away unto discretion; which what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they desired to have it set down, in what points, and how far forth they should yield unto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilest the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to do in Greece, & therefore took upon him gravely to set things in order among the tractable Achaens. He would have had them to restore the banished Lacedæmonians home into their Country; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Commonwealth. This the Achaens liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meer grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholden to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Achaens: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and saw that they should have their desire, without such compulsive mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Livius, much about the same time, fought a battell at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty sail of Rhadians came after the battell, when they were following the Chafe. The Kings Fleet was the better of sail; but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in 40 fight, was yet out of danger; as soon as he betook himself to a speedy retreat.

And such end had the first years war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuse themselves by fear; thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrary side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their victory: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored unto him Demetrius his younger son; whom some few years they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard he desired the Senate not to foretell time; but to send an Army, as soon as might be, into Asia: 50 promising, that his assistance, whereinsoever it pleased them to use it, should not be wanting. This Ptolemy was the son-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himself a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had been in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece, and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, and make him try the chance of a battell for his kingdom.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians; that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea, and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdom, with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an handful of the Achaens. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battell of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yieldeth to the 10 Romans great pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiaticque, as his brother was styled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Laelius. Laelius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had 20 not of long time bin put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an unblamable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent, P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the war against Antiochus, He himself would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controvertie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better man could they oppose, than Scipio: that had bin victorious against that same great Worthy: But indeed a worse man might have served well enough the turn. For Hannibal had no absolute command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation: where his wilddome was 30 more approved, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance, as a sign of the freedom that he used in his censures, even whilest he lived in such a Court. Antiochus mustered his Army in presence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may seem, to have made him wish, that he had bin served by such brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of gold, silver, and purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himself with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought, and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world: meaning that all his cost upon the backs of cowardly Asiaticque, was no better than a spoil to animate good Souldiers. 40 How little this answer pleased the king, it is easie to guess. The little life that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the use of his service, when he stood in greatest necessity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Emilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same year for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphissa City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore 50 they not only fortified that Town, but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left unregarded the last year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphissa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Castle, or higher Town, that was impregnable, whereinto they all retired. The Armenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalf of the Ætolians.

lians: entreating him to stand their friend, and help them in obtaining some tolerable condition of peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to perswade the Aetolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had bin chafed from Rome. The Conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from war: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpfull commodity which time should afford. So they obtained half a years truce; after which, the winter was like to afford them another half years leisure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time lost, to which with-held the War from passing over into Asia.

The business of Aetolia being thus laid aside, and the old Consul Glabrio sent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Thessaly, intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Hell's point. Yet they considered, that hereby they must commit themselves unto the loyalty of King Philip: who might either do them some mischief by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would he be unfaithfull; though he were not so courageous, yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that even for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to return. He had promised them the utmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some trial, by causing a Gentleman to ride Post unto him, and observe his doings as he should take him on the sudden. The King was merry at a feast, and drinking when the Messenger came: whom he lovingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what provision of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges over the rivers, and mended the bad ways by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned back in haste unto the Scipio's: who entering into Macedon, found all things in a readiness, that might help to advance their journey. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Hell's point: where they stayed a good while, until their Navie was in readiness to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year, though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of revenge upon his Countrymen, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea, thought to do somewhat upon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellows should arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work, and sent word, as in great secrecy, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admirall grew so careless, expecting still when he should receive a watch-word from Polyxenidas that he himself was taken by Polyxenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and, for fear of being discovered, resting one day in harbour by the way, came the second night to Samos: where, by morning it was ready to enter the Haven. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Haven; so to guard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himself by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies in another part of the Island: which falling upon the back of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies took him out of all order, and sunk or boarded all his Navie, five excepted, that by a sudden device made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Crescent upon two poles, at the Beak-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the enemy: who having not bethought himself what shift to make against such unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto these desperate Gallies; for fear lest they should burn together with themselves, a part of the Kings fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some loss by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, he was driven back again by the like foul weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they

they were not discouraged, set forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes, repaired their fleet, and all of them together, in great bravery, presented battell to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Ephesus. When he durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by storms at Sea; and another while by strong resistance made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdom. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elaa and Pergamus: and leaving his son Seleucus to besiege the royall City of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Army spoile the whole Country thereabout. Attalus the brother of king Eumenes, was then in Pergamus, having with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in fear; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thousand foot, and an hundred horse of the Achaens: old souldiers all, and trained up under Philopemen, whose Scholar, in the art of war, Diophanes their commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walls of Pergamus, which was an high town, the demeanour of the enemy; began to disdain that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Seleucus his army which was encamped at the hill-foot, seeing that none durst fall forth upon them, grew so careless: as otherwise than by spying all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an enemies country. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told him that he would go forth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he said, that the match was nothing equal. But the Achaen would needs have his wil: & issuing forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondered at first what his meaning was; but when they saw that he held himself quiet, they made a jest of his boldnes, & laughed to see with what a handful of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence & disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as fast as they wel might: and he himself, with the hundred horse, brake out on the sudden upon the station that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their horses ready saddled, but more few, or none had the hearts to make resistance: so as he drave them all out of their Camp, & chased them as far as he might safely adventure, with great slaughter of them, and no loss of his own. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the walls of the town, men and women, to behold this spectacle) were very joyfull; and highly magnified the verue of these Achaens. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to help the Achaens in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped half a mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had stayed many hours, looking who should begin: Seleucus, in fair order as he came, withdrew himself toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilst the enemy was in sight: but as soon as the ground between them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all haste, and soon overtaking them with his horse, charged them in Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldnes of the Achaens, and the baseness of his own men, caused Seleucus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of these Asiaticques, Philopemen had cause to tell the Romans, That he envied their victory. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiers betook themselves to Riot, as it had bin in a time of great security: a good man of war might have cut all their throats, even as they were tripling in their victualling houses; so which Philopemen said that he would have done, had he bin Generall of the Achaens, and not as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of business: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travell, brought almost nothing to passe. He had bin at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himself with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his son, as before hath been shewed, and went to Elaa: whither he heard that Emilius the Roman Admirall was come to bring succour to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Emilius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul: this Treaty brake off. Then followed the the overthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King; and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victory the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoice: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrians, did them in a manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hands, by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not far adventure upon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the war, the last and greatest was a victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battell was fought by Myonesus a Promontory in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him four-score and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the last year. That his Armada should cover all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fifty Gallies; the Rhodians two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timbered and thin planked, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themselves by the same device, with which five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran upon the enemy: who declining them for fear, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navy hoyted fail: and, having a fair wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the rest burnt or sunk. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Mastery of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seem to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had bin remaining to defend those places that he held in Europe, the presently with drew his Garrisons from Lyfimachia: which might easily have been kept even till the end of Winter following, and having reduced the besiegers (if the siege had been continued obstinately) unto termes of great extremity. He also gave over the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save only of defence, drew together all his Army; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consull, without impediment, not only came to the Hellepont, but had yielded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was also then in a readines to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that he landed quietly at his own good ease; even as if the Country had been his already. The first newes that he heard of the enemy, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perfwade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputes heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lyfimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lyfimachia; and was further purposed, not to strive with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with war? If it was their desire, that any other Towns upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at liberty, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain, and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the King would likewise bear half the charges, wherat they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should bear all the charges of the war, since it began through his own fault: and that He should not only depart out of those few Towns, which he held in Æolis and Ionis, but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himself on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore saw, that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantity of gold, together with the free restitution of his son; who (it is uncertain by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his son, than upon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publique business: He only said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lyfimachia, and suffered the war to take hold on his own Kingdom; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yield to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would advise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moved with his advice. For seeing that the Consull demanded of him no lesse, than if he had been already subdued: little reason there was that he should fear to come to battell; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must give way. He had with him three-score and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants; and many Chariots armed with hooks or tythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to hear that the Consull drew near him apace, as one hastening to fight. But howsoever he was affected, He made so little shew of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Elae, He sent thither unto him his son without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickness, and without not desirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own safety. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein he dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to do such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards have been little worth, than to stay untill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recovery of his son: so as the joy thereof was thought, to have been much available unto his health. An recompence of the Kings humanity, He said only thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by advising him not to fight untill he shall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his counsell: and therefore withdrew himself from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magnesia by Sypilus: where encamping, he fortified himself as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consull, and sat down within four miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse, driven back over the River. Two dayes were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance: nor were at all opposed, untill they came within two miles and a half of Antiochus his Camp. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foot: whom the ordinary Corps de garde repelled. Four dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies, and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came half way forward, and presented battail, which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consull took advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all winter, far from any Country of their friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties: unless they would stain their honour by returning far back, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the war untill the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was thoroughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Cry, That this great Army should be assailed, even in the Camp where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in fear of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans took the field again, and ordered their Battels:

He

He also did the like, and advanced so far, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army consisted of four Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and four hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points, the Roman, in the mean battell. All of them, according to their wonted form, were divided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them followed the Principes, at such distance as was usual, and last of all, the Triarii. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries, partly Achaens, and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Ulmost of all (save some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred, the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the bank of the River: yet four troupes of Horse were placed there, though such help seemed in a manner needless. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Camp. The Consul had with him sixteen African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being far the greater, and more courageous beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diversly appointed, and not so all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kinds, in such wise as each might be of most use. The main strength of his Foot consisted in sixteen thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the midst, and divided into ten Battalions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible show. On the right hand of these were fifteen hundred horse of the Gallio-Greeks: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrey, and accompanied by some others. All which Troups of Horse, divided in their severall kinds, do seem to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have been stretched out in Front. Adjoining unto these, were sixteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings own Regiment, called the Argyalpides, or Silver-shields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had served under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on horseback, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Myfia, with four thousand slingers and Archers of the Citians, and Elymaens. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallio-Greeks, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hooks or lynes, and the Dromedaries, wherof were Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrtians, Elymaens, and many others, having also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himself commanded in the right wing: Selencus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first onser was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with shoutings, and noises, and some wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running back upon their own men, did the same harm which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged upon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shameful to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seem credible: that the Phalangiers, with with such variety of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance, but all of them fled, in a manner, as soon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himself, being in the left wing of his own battail: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gave upon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Aemilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, issued forth with all his power to help his fellows: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach, He not only turned his Horse about, but ran away upon the spur without further tarriance. The Camp was defended a little while: and with no great valour, though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this battell fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night, hearing that Selencus was gone thither before. He left the custody of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Towns-men and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatness of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded up themselves by Embassadours: whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neither were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Camp: having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leave to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that War, they required fifteen thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and people of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelve thousand, in twelve years next ensuing, by even portions. Likewise they demanded four hundred talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corn, that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoon the Ætolian, with some others who had hired up the King to this war, delivered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, & Cn. Manlius Volsco. The Ætolians desired peace, but could not obtain it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make war upon the Ætolians; the other, upon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came news that Antiochus was already vanquished in battell, and had submitted himself unto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon after this, came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea, by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the business in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his own deserts, and comparing himself with Masanissa hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had been to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was only such in title; and since both he and his Father had alwayes been their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what he would have: He still referring himself to their courtisie; and they desiring him to speak plain. At length he craved that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving liberty to many of the Greek Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his War; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it self had been subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alledged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this; and very bountifullly gave away so much, that every one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the war against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the pomp whereof exceeded in riches, not only that of Titus Quintus Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of the Asiaticus: which the fortune of his Victory had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. of Sibyls Prophecies; the Books of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

MARCUS FULVIUS and CNA. MANLIUS had the same charge divided between them, 30 which L. Cornelius Scipio, now stiled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it self to the Roman Majesty, it was now to be brought unto more lowly terms than any other of the Greeks. The best was that so great a storm fell not unexpected upon the Ætolians. They had foreseen the danger, when their Embassadours were utterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedy, which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well devise, even upon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage. 40

Poor King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Asiamanians (besides that many of them bore a naturall affection to their own Prince) having been long accustomed to serve a Mountain Lord, that conversed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, used by the Captains of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, & offered their service towards his restitution. At the first there were only four of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet, assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to try his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty adventurers, having divided themselves into four parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the multitude, four of the chief Towns in the Country, to his use. The same of this good success at the first; with divers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to do their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip unable to think upon resistance. One of them held the Town of Theium a few dayes; giving thereby some leisure unto his King to pro-

provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all save two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athenaum, a little Asiamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argiſthea, that was chief of the Country. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldnesse to descend upon Argiſthea, for that they might perceive the Asiamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come down upon them, when they should be busie. 10 Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argiſthea, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Asiamanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plain flight, with great losse of men and armes, few of those elcaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Country, untill Philip his return.

The Ætolians having found the business of Asiamania so easie, made an attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged unto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Ætolians again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to cont nue. These took Armes at first: but soon laid them away; seeing their neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their own King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to return.

Of these victories the joy was the lesse, for that newes came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consul his hasting with an Army into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in despite, that he had recovered his own from Philip with such help as he could get. Neither seems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his losses: for of this fault they 30 neither were sharp correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the business, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdom. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians; yet could not by them be relieved, unless they would adventure to fight upon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driven from their new conquest, by Persens the son of P. Philip, who invaded the Counties of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with so many at once, and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the mean while the Athenian and Rho- 40 dian Embassadours came, who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the Assailants, or danger that might seem to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend half his time about one City, and so be driven to leave unto his successeur the honour of finishing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Ætolians, and bade them seek peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it over-dear, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdom their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Aminander, offering his service as a mediatur, to put himself into Ambracia, and try what good his persuasions might do with the Citizens. So after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grievous to the weaker, but not unufferable. The same 50 Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grievous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicit. The Ætolians were bound to uphold the Majesty of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Country. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Acheans, by stiffly pressing their own right) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbear the Country. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others might lay claim, there was set down an order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Judges of their controversies, when they should arise. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consull, had at the same time war in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Army was the same that had followed L. Scipio, of whose victory, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at wars, without regard of the great alteration that hapned in Asia. From every of these he got somewhat, and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an errand. He was even laden with booty, when, having fetcht a compass about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame & terror of their fore-past acts, than any present virtue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such trial, when they served under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves far the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safety, that they dwelt upon the River Helys, in an In-land Country, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their own Nation, that had been friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then was no counsell thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Country, and, with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high mountains of Olympus and Margana. These mountains were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the natural strength being helpt by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled, and that finally, when he had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For, whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careless of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would have served well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came far otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of Armes than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily prevail against casters of stones, especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally the Barbarians, wanting defensive Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and the weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong down the steep rocks. Few of the men escaped alive: all their wives, children and goods became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soon after, at the other mountain: only more of them saved themselves by flight, as having fairer way at their backs.

These wars being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retain as Proconsull, his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his second year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave peace to those whom he had vanquished, as likewise to Aviaries the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for fear of the Roman Armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid upon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto he swore, and received the Kings oath oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellepont, laden with spoil, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many years extorted from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull use, which the Roman Souldier had been wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household-stuffe, and slaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the seeds of that luxury, which finally over-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellepont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stir. But when Manlius came along with a huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwiser than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, & well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himself was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his own Kingdome, if the people of Rome had not made war in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himself three thousand talents, and fifty ships of war, to take part with him and the Ætolians, promising moreover to restore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the war began: he thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not only the half of Asia, but Chersonesus, and Lyfimaehia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himself they bestowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to go to Rome and beg favours in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhadians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipios, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into near acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby he made himself acquainted with the wars in Spain and Africa. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes took a surer way. For the Scipios had not the disposing of that which they won from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these upstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himself; yea himself unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himself against Antiochus, or rather that he had joyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might have been freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be urged to discourse more at large. At the present it was believed, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assail the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all advantages; & they sell, unexpected, upon the carriages that were beset in the midst of the Army, whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting and the saving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought until it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the booty, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a fair march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax, as an unworthy commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindered the peace with Antiochus; they

they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamity threatened by Sibyls verses, unto those that should passe the fatal bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecy threatened the Roman Captain or Army, that should passe over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Army beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before hand won, in a fort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount, which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied the n for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seem to have had reference unto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen upon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullius noeth, sew'd a randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemy to his Kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and modern Christian Writers have been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophecy. Of the Sibylline predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I think few men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But observance of the shamefull Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the books of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Ensebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon upon the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but even the books of Hermes, which have born such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever devised them) by the undifferent zeal of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forein proofs. And in the same rank, I think, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Ensebius from no mean Authors. Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it been true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have obtained from speaking any word of an argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amiss in place of Simoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Virivivus a Rebell, had many ages before been consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sanguis, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoil that time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sanguis, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historical, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firm upon a sure foundation) lean over-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those monies which the common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the second Punick War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the City, untill

the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, only by this accusation, known to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great train of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middle of the Assembly, and offered himself to speak. Having audience, he told the people, That upon the same day of the 10 year he had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punick War by a signal victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law, but intended to visit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty business of the Common-wealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever since the seventeenth year of his life, until he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, even the Officers of the 10 court followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their own slaves and a Cryer, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, until for very shame, as not knowing what else to do, they granted him, unrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himself to a disgracefull trial: he willingly relinquished the City, and his unthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to undergo so much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Literum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year, in this voluntary banishment, it is uncertain. The report of his dying in the same year, with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his private behaviour 30 at Literum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribune-ship of his accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. However it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Asiaticque. They propounded a Decree unto the People, touching money received of Antiochus, & not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, & instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, virtue, temperate, valiant, and of singular industry; frugal also, both of the publike, and of his own; so as in this kinde 40 he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he unmercifull and unconscionable, in seeking to increase his own wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with envie, troubled both himself and the whole City, whilst he lived. His mean birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chief estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own rank, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glaborius, whose Lievtenant he had been at Thermopyla, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjury. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold and silver, gotten in the 50 Camp of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's grew partly, (besides his generall spight at the Nobility) from his own first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African, partly from some check, that was given unto himself, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consul's bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner, Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthily of the virtue that was far above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue reports against his Generall, whose noble noble deeds confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A severe inquiry and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soon condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non-payment, his body should have been laid up in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the use of the City, when there neither appeared any sign of his having best beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had been condemned to pay, then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and Clients, made such a Collection for him, as would have set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. He took no more than such of his own goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his nearest friends.

And thus began the civill war of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been, or not been much regardable, untill now, since the Punic War. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especial helps to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold upon that great Worthy, to whose virtue Rome was indebted, for changing into go great security her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within hear words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome business, grew to perfection, they that found themselves overmarched by their adversaries at this kind of weapon, began to make opposition, first, with clubs and stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frays and murders in the streets, unto barrail in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare virtue, that in honour of her two sons was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sons whilst they were but young, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take upon them Authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Consuls all the whole power of the City, under this form, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonwealth receive no detriment. By this decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way, it was not long ere Marinus a famous Captain of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the City, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the civill wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himself absolute Lord of Rome, taught Caesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtain the like sovereign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was provoked. It is true, that never any Consul had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurding of stones, and other violence, made the City stand in need of a Sovereign Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Caesar, or give him at least pretence, to right himself by arms: wherewith prevailing against his adversaries, he took such order, that neither Senate nor people, should thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their own freedom, and became subjects unto the arbitrary government of one: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they took upon them as the highest Lords on earth, to do even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto compleat greatness, nor believed of her self as if she had, whilst a King fate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the sequel will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian VVarre.

§. III.

- 10 The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They dealt insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unready for war, obtains peace at Rome, by his son Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

- 20 FURTHER the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonwealth of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had been, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publique declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassalls to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or unto Sovereign power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and War, To beat Money, and to reserve (as the French call it) le dernier Ressort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed four; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeal, or last resort, as every petty injury offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome, from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King or Commonwealth declined, He or they were beaten, and informed to obedience, or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Nevertheless it is true, that they had their own Lawes, and Officers of their own ordaining: yet so, as neither the Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especial regard unto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

- And to such degree of servitude the severall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliverance from a yoke more sensibly grievous, or, as being skillfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chief hope of thriving; or, as being more fearfull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their own honour. But Eumenes living further off, & being most obsequious 40 unto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of war & peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to use his own even as he listed, untill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdome bordered upon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For upon the same reason (as well as upon his own high deserts) were they very loving unto Masaniissa, and to his House, untill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Africa: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subjection unto themselves, by the Ministry of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were useful and obsequious unto them.

- 50 Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himself not forgetfull of his own former greatness, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, then as want of due reverence to their estate, and a valuation of himself against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not indure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately given passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the waies for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them over the Hellepont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes and the States of Thessaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, with all Pieces and places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Towns of Ennus and Maronea had been part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his Dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: in which Province it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold have been found, in the age of our Grand-fathers, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victory. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Selencus Nicator by right of war, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemy Ceraunus thought them his own, when he had murdered Selencus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustain, did shortly and easily wash away from that crown, together with the more part of Thrace, all those flocks of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the son of Demetrius, and his successors: though not much, for they were otherwise busied. The fury of the Gauls being over-past, those Countreys; which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their liberty; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting up the waies, where-by the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own estate: yet forasmuch as these Towns were, in a manner, at absolute liberty, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Etolians, of wrongfull usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answer. That his Garrison did only save it from the Thracians: who as soon as he thence withdrew his men, did seize upon the Town, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Ennus and Maronea; That they were places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not availed him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their own title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former war: and since they, by their victory, had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it unto their disposition, Whether Ennus and Maronea should be set at liberty: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceive, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave sentence against him in every controversy. Nevertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintain his right unto these Towns; wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the war against Antiochus and the Etolians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himself, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two towns, lying so fitly for the guard of his kingdome, which he had gotten to himself out of the ruins of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruins Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deal more? By such allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at leastwise to gain time, wherein he might bethink himself what he had to do. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had been their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, he took council of his own passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gave order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians

* Hist. of Hungary by Mart. Pumeck lib. 5.

Thracians by night, that they might sack the Town, and use all cruelties of war. This was done: but to ill taken by the Roman Embassadors who had better notice, than could have been feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majesty, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himself, and layed it even upon the Maronites: affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throats. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who survived, were either his own friends, or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more severe, and more thoroughly informed in the business, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himself of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour so lightly to give away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; He took order to have him paysoned by the way. By this we see, that the doctrine, which Machiavel taught unto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischievous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischief, was not of his own invention. All ages have given us examples of this goodly policy, the latter having been apt scholars in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reign of Henry the eighth, here in England, can bear good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same unjust Law that himself had devised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, & were like to have brought upon him the war which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger son Demetrius as Ambassador unto the Senate: giving him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliver his own grievances in such wise, that it ought were amiss, yet might it appear that he had been strongly urged to take such courses. The sum of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himself was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate; as having been well approved by them, when he was Hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely to prevail somewhat; were it only in regard that would be born unto his person.

Whilst this businessse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to divert from himself some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had been Judges between him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and took notice of the controversies, which they found between some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Acheans. It was objected unto the Acheans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedamon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the wals of the City: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, the Prator of the Acheans, made answer, That these banished Lacedemonians, who now took upon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them; were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they laid the blame upon others: the Acheans having not only called those unto judgement, that were supposed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans: and these Plaintiffs having slain them, upon private, though just hatred, as they were coming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing down the Wals of Lacedamon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance: who, having perswaded his Citizens to defend their Town and liberty by their proper vertue, did inhibit unto them all kinds of fortifications: as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Usurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycorgus his ordinances; and governed the City by their own lawless Will. As for the Achaens, they communicated their own Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soon change them and take better, unto the Lacedemonians, whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policy. For conclusion, Lycorgus plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embassadors, That he and his Countrymen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained to answer and give account of their actions, as vassals & slaves unto the people of Rome. For if they were indeed at liberty: why might not the Achaens as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans had busied themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon; for if the Romans would stand upon their greatness, and intimate as they begun, that the liberty of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Achaens have recourse unto those Agreements that were confirmed by oath; and which without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold answer of Lycorgus Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state upon him, he pronounced more like a Master than a Judge, that if the Achaens would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to do what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achaens, which groined to hear the Lordly words of Appius. Yet fear prevailed above indignation; and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very soon after, did make void all judgements of death or banishment; that had been laid by the Achaens, upon any Citizen of Lacedemon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedemon should be suffered to continue a member of the Achaen Common-wealth; or, taken from them and made as it had been an Estate by it self. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, that they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the councill of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Achaens, than the power which they had over them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterrann Seas, reduced themselves, by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsel and persuasions of many wise and temperate men among them; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meer Vassals, to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policy so prevail with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore bought revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and cities, into most base and fearfull servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greeks very far from daring to stir against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subjection, had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the country would be his, whensoever he should rake Armies, as shortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignity soon following. He had been long used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, unskillfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted unto him, to read such brief notes as he had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his own sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnisse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreaty of his son, together with some insolence of his son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increase in Philip.

his hatred unto Rome, and breed in him a jealousy of his too forward son. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome, some bringing one commandement, some another; and some requiring him to fulfill those things, which had been imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands, yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius was conversant: rather perhaps out of simplicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deal more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the King, should not succeed unto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans. This offended not only Perseus, but Philip him self: who suspected his younger son, as more Roman than his own; and accordingly mis-construed all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousy; it will not be amiss to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late been so peremptory with the Achaens; that they seemed not unlike'y to take part against them, in any controversy that should be mov'd. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed unto the Achaen Common-wealth, having long been of a contrary Fact on thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Society, with purpose to set up againe the Estate of their own, severed from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerful in their City; who finding the multitude very inclinable to their purpose, and not overstrongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to seek occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achaen League. And hereupon they began to do some acts of hostility; whereby it was probable that blood should be drawn, and either side so far exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of this commotion and proceedings, Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achaens, levied such forces as he could in haste, and went against them. Many principal Gentlemen of the Achaens, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readiness to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, horse, he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captain of the Messenians: whom he charged, and forced to run. But whilest his horsemen were too earnest in following the chase; there arrived by chance a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again: and with the help of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopœmen's horsemen to turn back. Philopœmen himself had long been lick of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatness of his courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their safety, which had so willingly adventured themselves under his conduct. He took upon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom the reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching over near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall off his horse, and being with all in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet scarce believed their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so far from being beleaved, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfy themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his virtue, and of the singular benefits by him done unto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant: began to manifest their good will for his delivery. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any disgrace, or injury, done to him, unrevenge. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault under ground, that had been made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him down fast bound, and with an engine laid a heavy stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him, with a cup of poyson, which Philopamen took in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerful countenance, drank his last draught. He was seventy years old, and weakened with long sickness, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily took away his life. The Achaens, when they missed him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindfull to preserve their own lives, than to look unto the safety of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were devising what to do in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in case that fair means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen General of the Army against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Town, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himself, and made an end of his own life. The rest of those that had been partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds upon the ashes of Philopamen that were carryed home in solemn pomp to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slain at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martins, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. He would have intervened in this businesse of Messene, had not Lycortas made short work, and left him nothing to do.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the war against Eumenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spiteful enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein unworthy of the Crown he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the first conference between the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had devised some secret salies underground to save himself from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practice, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himself from their torture and merciless hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way to escape, nor counsell to resort unto, he took the poyson into his hand, which he alwaies preierved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of adverse fortune; which being ready to swallow down, he uttered these words: I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that fear which hath so many years possessed them: that fear, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbed among the rest of his hericall deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how far the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblesse of their forefathers, as when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, & was ready to give them battle at their own doors, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poy-

son; whereas these of a latter race, have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore been one of their consuls, so practise with Prusias, contrary to the honor of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Ewms of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then curling the person of Prusias, with all his hand, desiring the immortal gods to revenge his fidelity, drank off the poyson, and dyed.

In this year also (as goon Authors have reported) to accompany Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African; these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the world had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he been Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War which he undertook, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and envious Faction at home, as his proper vertue, wanting publicke force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolve it self in his own, and in the Common misery of his Country and Common-weale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envy of our equals, and jealousie of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-weales, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of men of war, and great captaines, being no Kings. For besides the envy and jealousie of men, the spoyle, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with good reason did Mauluc the Marshall of France confesse, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, & without restriction, it were in vain for those of his profession to hope for a portion of themselves: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the victories which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serve. For the most of others, whose vertues have raised them above the level of their inferiours, and have surmounted their envy: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans, we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Livius, L. Emilius, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greeks we read of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea long before these times, it was a Legacie that David bequeathed unto his victorious Captaine Joab. With this fare Alexander feasted Pirrenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereunto Valentinian the Empror invited Atius: who, after many other victories, overthrow Attelia of the Hunnes, in the greatest battel for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, beside run-aways, an hundred and fourscore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emprour by Proximus, That in killing of Atius, he had cut off his own right hand with his left: for it was not long after, that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Atius) murdered the Emprour; which hee never durst attempt Atius living. And besides the loss of that Emprour, it is true, That with Atius, the glory of the Western Empire was rather dissolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny, or a far worse, had Bellisarius, whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Justinian: and he died a blinde begger. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Justinian. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed, a Turkish one, That every warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of war, than suffer his own glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomas; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Viziers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsalvo, who drove the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrel. The Earles of Egmond and Horn had no heads left them to wear garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations have been paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of War. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very few, as rewards of their military virtue; though many have usurped them, by the help and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traitorously cast down their Masters, and stepped up into their seats, were not all of them good men of war: but have used the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which undeservedly were attributed to their personal worth. So that the number of those that have purchased absolute greatness by the greatness of their warlike virtue, is farre more in seeming than indeed. Phocas was a souldier, and by the help of the Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward, and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other then cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himself. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid unto him again by Heraclius: who took from him the Imperial Crown, unjustly gotten, and set it on his own head. Leontius laid hold upon the Emperour Jusline, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius, to whose charge he had left his own men of war. Jusline, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion, Philippicus commanding the forces of Jusline, murdered both the Emperour and his son. Anastasius, the vassal of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endless and a needless work to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius, how many others have been repaid with their own cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captains to make themselves Kings, have by Gods justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the best way of thriving by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberality of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of unthankfulness in this kinde, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little City and a few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poor and wiseman therein, and he delivered the City by his wisdom: but none remembered this poor man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have been indebted for great benefits: which the unwise sort of them think to favour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes couzened and abused; which proves their weakness to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountiful in giving thanks, yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines have made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the Enemy, they are very inquisitive to search into it, and to strip the well-delivers out of their gettings: yea most injuriously to rob them of their own, upon a false supposition: that even they whose hands are most clean from such offences, have purloyned somewhat from the common Treasury. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipios being so lately recited.

In my late Sovereignes time, although for the wars, which for her own safety, she was constrained to undertake, her Majesty had no less cause to use the service of Martial men both by Sea and Land, then any of her Predecessors for many years had: yet according to the destiny of that profession, I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest, and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any service by them performed. And that her Majesty had many advised, valiant, and faithful men, the prosperity of her affaires did well witness, who in all her dayes never received dishonor, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by herself chosen and employed.

For as all her old Captaines by Land died poor men, as Malbey, Randol, Dyewry, Rende, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Constable, Bonchier, Barkeley, Bingham, &c others:

so those of a later and more dangerous employment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honor to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did; those (I say) with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many travels and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posterity. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie, L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Majesty in the advancement of her Men of war did sooner believe other men than her self, a disease unto which many wise Princes, besides her self, have been subject, I say that that such a confidence, although it may seem altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weakness. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so unprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this; that those which are nextest the person of Princes (which Martial men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession far more noble than their own, seeing therein they should only mind their Masters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving less honor and reward to men of far greater deserving, and of far greater use than themselves.

But his Majesty hath already paid the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieving by Pensions all the poorer sort, he hath honored more Martial men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred years.

He hath given a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable service, as well in the year 1588. as at Calix, the Islands, and in our own Sea; having first commanded as a Captain, twice admiral of a Squadron, and twice Admiral in chief. His Majesty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes; and created Sidney Vicount, Knolles, Russel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester Barons, for their governments and services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

Philip, making provision for war against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own subjects. His negotiation with the Bassarna. His cruelty. He suspecteth his son Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus, and shortly after slain by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

Quintius Martius the Roman Ambassador, who travelled up and down, seeking what work might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to use the utmost of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedonia. At his return home, that he might not seem to have discovered nothing, he told the Fathers, that Philip had done whatsoever they enjoyed him; yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meer necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend unto rebellion, about which he was devising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obsequiousness to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their own hands; with safety of their honour, if they could finde convenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparent) by what means soever. He was in an ill case: as having been already vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorred to hear of War with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could devise, against the necessity which he daily feared. Such of his own people as dwelt in the maritime Towns, and gave him cause to suspect that they would do but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwellings, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, were filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deal more assured against against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he devised upon alluring the Bastarna, a strong and hardy Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their fear, and come to him with all their multitude: who besides other great rewards, would help them to root out the Dardanius, and take possession of their Country. These were like to do him notable service against the Romans; being not only stout fighting men, but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would bear respect unto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrival, must be the utter extirpation of the Dardanius; a People always troublesome to the Kingdom of Macedon, whenever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to persuade those Bastarna, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, 10 into a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italy it self. It was not known who should withstand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Sordisci, and peradventure some others, through whose Country they were to pass, would accompany them against the Romans, were it only in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remove of these Bastarna from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardanius, upon the border of Macedon, a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to pass. And thus he sought means to strengthen himself, with help of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any civil Nation, about the whole compass of the Mediterranean Seas. But these devices were long ere they took effect: so as the Bastarna came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the mean time he neglected not the training of his men to war, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions against those wilde people that bordered upon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsels and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdom, and in his own house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wils to forsake their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meet for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it self within words: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did unwillingly, being himself over-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This evil therefore would soon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindictive nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly sought revenge where it was needful. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deservedly. This increased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more general, when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom hee had injured, thought himself unlike to be safe, untill he should have massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical than perhaps he could have desired, gave men cause to think (as they could not in reason think otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heaven, he felt the like misery in his own children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger son. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention between the brethren, but only to cherish the virtue and towardliness of Demetrius, like as we find it in their Histories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual respect of them, bred extreame jealousy in the fathers hand. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the falshood of their apparel, or the unsightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jested at in ordinary discourse and table-talk, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praising them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadors as often as they came, gave his father cause.

cause to think, that he was no fit partaker of any counsell held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder son Perseus: who fearing to much left his brother should step between him and the succession, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty years old, of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discovered. The jealousy of the King having entertained such suspicions that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder son, a slight occasion made the fire break out, that had long lain smothered. A Muster and ceremonious lustration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great solemnity. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twain a bunch, and threw the head and forepart, with the entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Army was to passe. This done the armies of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first original, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two sons: after him came his own band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Army was divided into two parts: which under the Kings two sons, charged each other in manner of a true fight, using poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this 20 present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did over-earnestly seek each to get the upper hand, as a tokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, untill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himself was sorry for this, as it had been some bad preface: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort: who, perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him 30 beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. The of the brethren was that day to feast his own companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaved himself so indiscreetly, that he was taken & well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go visit his brother, and see what cheer he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his train behinde, but forced them all to bear him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there such good espial kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made 40 known to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doors, as if he stood in fear to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himself excluded, and feared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with an entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger unto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, & in effect the same that hath been here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worke. But the main point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and born out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect unto his father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a letter, sent of late from Titus Quintus to the King himself: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further do well to send him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honourable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsell was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should should wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become servants to this young traitor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that converted matters of pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he fought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bear him, he said that it grew, if not by his own virtue, at leastwise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, he were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted no such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren, besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a father, though a jealous father, that he would conclude nothing upon the excess or error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seem to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gave himself over wholly to Perseus: using so little conference with his younger son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him present, nor near unto him. Above all, he had especial care, to learn out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintinus, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philocrates & Apelles; men whom he thought no way interested in the quarrels between the brethren, though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince, with an intimation, as by way of granting it, that his youthful and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices unjustifiable, against his elder brother, which yet should never take effect: for that Titus himself would not be author, or abettor of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly persuade the king to think his son a dangerous Traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in custody, made shew as if he had pitted the estate of the unhappy Prince, and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered unto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome, where he might hope not only to live in safety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claim as he had in reversion unto the Crown of Macedon. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas, who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the escape, and in the mean while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his son to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behevfull to make him away privily, for fear lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proof sufficient, at least, of the Kings despite against them, if not of his meaning to renew the war. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings unadvised sentence, first gave payson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedy: who villainously accomplished their work, by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own blood. The houses of Lyfimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their heels; by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on desire of soveraign rule, or fear of losing it. By the like unnaturall hatred, had almost bin cut off the lines of Ptolemy and of Seleucus: which, though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upstart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it self to marvellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meeke slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to have propounded the last of them to his own children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to do: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himself of an unmerciful nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good persuader or a kindly affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his own; did now procure vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded him with a draught of his own poyson. After the death of his son, he too late began to examine the crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equal balance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think that malice had not been contriver of the whole process: His only remaining son Perseus could to all dissemble the pleasure which he took in being freed from all danger of competition, as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to be feared than at other times, when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, left off his usual trouble of minde, and carelesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times, by those that well understood the difference between a rising and a setting Sun. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner so desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousness of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspicious imaginations; the like whereof he had never been slow to apprehend. He was much vexed; and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that he grew thereby hateful to Perseus; and thus becoming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This Counsellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent itself, and give ease to the King, until the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected, as also that Philocrates and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flamininus that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the business: made diligent inquiry after the truth. In this doing, he found one Xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended; brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xychus for fear of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had been employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of business. No marvel, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnaturall practice of one son, he had so wretchedly cast away another, far more virtuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himself, and withall against the Authors of the mischief. Upon the first newes of this discovery, Apelles fled away, and got into Italy; Philocrates was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not deny it when Xychus confronted him, yielded himself guilty; or else was put to torture. Perseus was now grown stronger, than that he should need to flye the country: yet not so stout as to adventure himself into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome towards Thrace, whilst his father wintred at Demetrius. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power, this his ungracious son, took a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it upon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive grief of minde, so disabled him in the travell thereto belonging, that ere he could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yeeld to nature. He had reigned about two and forty years: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himself with continual wars, of which that with the Romans was most unhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evil that befell him, he might thank his own perverse condition: since his Uncle, King Antigonus, had left unto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was justly punished by feeling the difference between the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whilst yet it was only drawing near, was fore-signified unto Perseus, by Caligene the Physician, who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the sudden, and took possession of the Kingdom: which in fine he no lesse improvidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Bastarna fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Masaniſſa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achaens, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring upon him.

Immediately upon the death of Philip, came the Bastarna into Thrace, where order had been taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnity of the Country. This compact was friendly observed, as long as no other was known than that Philip did live to recompense all that should be done, or sustained, for his service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon, and not heard with-all, that he took any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dash and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford to good markets unto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarna would not be contented with reason, but became their own carvers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Bastarna had the upper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plain Countries. But the victors made little use of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, received by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, save thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I do not finde. It seems that by the careless use of some victories, they drew losse upon themselves: and finally took that occasion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Perseus, he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his reign, to embroile himself in a war so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his minde to the settling of his Estate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himself, as the condition of his affairs should require, either for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Antigonus. To win love of his people, he sate personally to hear their causes in judgement, (though herein he was so over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of justice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightful spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all necessity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first work, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seem a wonder how in few years, to his utter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious. His fear was indeed the mastering passion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proof of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in wars against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Isfria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore, as ever since the victory, a heavy hand; and suffered Masaniſſa to take from them what he listed.

listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their own, to take annes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Masaniſſa therefore had great advantage over them, and was not ignorant how to use it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia; and so did he use them again and again; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniſſa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians, which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for love of his wife Sophonista, and of Asdrubal his father-in law. This did Masaniſſa take from them by force: and by the Romans (to whose judgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Estate, to use all manner of submissive obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masaniſſa came upon them againe, and took from them above seventy Towns and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make war out of their own Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniſſa, invading their Country; howsoever he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was Confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to bear defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that they might have fairer justice; or be suffered to defend their own by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly give place to favor, that the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how far forth Masaniſſa should be allowed to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gave them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment as they themselves in honour should think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges; than continually to live in fear, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithal the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping: in hope to move compassion.

Here may we behold the fruits of their envy to that valiant house of the Barchines; of their irresolution in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy, and of their half-penny-worthing in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole estate in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they servants, even to the servants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, slain, taken & sold as bondslaves in the Streets of Carthage, and in all cities of Affrick & Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often and so earnestly desired. Only they want peace with Masaniſſa, once their mercenary; and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruel hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperity as might have been their owne. But the Romans had far better entreated Varro, who lost the battel at Canna; than Hannibal, that wan it was used by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Commonwealth, and employed their labours for the publique, without craving recompence: as also so they had not thought it much, though being in extrem want, to set out an Army into Spain, at what time the enemy lay under their own walls. There were no Carthaginian virtues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their tears may seem to have been mistrusted, as proceeding no less from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniſſa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained not such leave as they sought, of defending their own right by arms: but contrariwise, when without leave obtained, they presumed to far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the son of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He therefore was called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deal in that business. Onely it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Councel divers nights, in the Temple of Æsculapins: whereupon he himself was dispatched away to Rome, there to intreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be overmuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masanissa's sake, they had done, and would do, whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their justice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those Lands, which by the covenants of the League, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and wished him to tell his Father, that he should do well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian war was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for fear of urging them unseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little help. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better usage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africa round about him, and Carthage therewithal, should be his own.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These he entertained kindly at first, until (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, until the Bassarna were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no less ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did unto other some. Where he did harm to any; they called it, making war upon their friends: Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dræpians, his subjects, (upon what occasion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It seems that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have presumed far, unless either they had been extremely provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them, Perseus did soon allay it, and reclaim them by strong hand. But the Romans took very angrily this presumption of the King: even as if he had invaded some Country of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his own rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had he humbled once his neck, they could themselves have done the part of Masanissa, though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That the Conditions of the League between them were such as made it unlawful, both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take arms without their licence first obtained.

To the same pils they would also faine have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents, even such as had entred into league with them upon equal termes: whom usually they rewarded with a frown, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Arms, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hercof the Achaens had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their own carvers, and whose hope of extraordinary favour at Rome caused them.

them the more willingly to refer their causes to arbitrement. For when they wear about to have chastised the Messenian by wars, T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, even with Lordly threats, when they took upon them to carry any business of importance, by their own power, without standing unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheless upon submission, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in usurping the practice of Arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard lesson, they were such untoward scholars, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed unto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Achaens, refused not only to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the renour of the League between them; but further, with a careless insolence, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italy, with victuals or arms. Herewith not content, the Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians would revolt from the Achaens; they themselves would think it a business no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was believed, that the Common wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distress; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achaens had utterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no town rebelled from the Achaens, but many entered into their corporation; then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the City,) That they had straightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have served their own turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume unto themselves a Sovereign power, in directing all matters of war, which dissemblingly they would have seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make war; whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meer strangers; without interposing the authority of the Senate and people of Rome: unless peradventure, sometimes they winked at such violence, as did help towards the accomplishment of their own secret malice. Now these Roman Arts, howsoever many (for gainful or timorous respects) would seem to understand them; yet were generally displeasing unto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent City in Greece, having neither subjects of their own that might rebel, nor power whereto with to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, untill the war of Antistridates: being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Grantors of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdomes that with over-nice diligence, strove to preserve their Liberties and Lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to be devoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to have affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to break.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neer neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his subjects, could not want good information of all that might concern him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long since foretold, of the miserable subjection, wherinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publique to fall out with the Romans, yet all of them had the care to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, be flatterers of the greatness which kept all in fear. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestical conspiracies would soon be at an end; when honestie, and love of the Common-weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly advertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors, whom all men knew to be little better then spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors (of whom every Citie in Greece had too many) as were men unregarded among their own people, and therefore more like to speak maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their own desires of employment. But it is hard to conceive that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Achaans being to send Embassadors to Rome; that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the same business, chose one Callierates, among others, to go in that Embassy. By their making choice of such a man, one may perceive the advantage, which mischievous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome business of the weale publique. For this Callierates was in such wise transported with ambition, that he chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himself therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alledging what was meetest in justification of his people, he uttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Achaans, and all the rest of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the settling of their authority, among his forward Countreymen; if they meant not wholly to forgo it. For now there was taken up a custome, to stand upon points of confederacie, and laws: as if these were principally to be had in regard; any injunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achaans, both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if hee, and some other of his opinion, might have their wils: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columns, or Monuments erected, nor no solemn oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the observance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, that the multitude refused to give ear unto such persuasions. For howsoever in popular Estates, the sound of libertie used to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, seeming never so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their own good, the number of them would increase apace, and they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman majesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greeks; who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwise of little account or desert, only for having uttered some brave words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their party strong; resolved to follow this good counsell, in every point; yea to deprecate all those that held with the right, and to set up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achaans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedaemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalf of Callierates, they advised all men to be such, and and so affected, as he was, in their several common weales. With this dispatch, Callierates returned home a joyfull man: having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himself into the way of preferment. Nevertheless he forbore to vaunt himself of his eloquence used in the Senate. Only he so reported his Embassy, that all men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such Arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achaans: in which Magistracy, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serve to manifest his ready obsequiousness unto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes wan many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberal gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure unto himself those that ill could brook his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honestier than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans, some with the Macedonian, and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wherein they lived. Hee eat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignity not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vassal, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them just occasion to make war upon him. Perseus having finished his business among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him: yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worke for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himself; so such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoever, done by his father, might be buried with his father; since his own meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have been pleased better, if he had behaved himself after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostility in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to have taken such a journey, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He labored greatly to recover the love of the Achaans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemn decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousy perhaps; no less then hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoever Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them cause to abhor him; yet in the publique administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficial, that not without much ado, and at length, without any general consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, even for preservation of concord among them, to use all circumspection, that he might not, by his agencie, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country towards him, so doubtfully affected; especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of War, and when a ll danger of innovation was past, was uncivil, if not inhumane; as notwithstanding deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achaans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the kingdom of Macedon: yet understanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to pass, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ran daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the loss of such, as made of their slaves very profitable use. But Perseus took hold upon this occasion: as fitly serving to pacifie those, whose enmity saice he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all these fugitives, to send them home againe: and wrote unto the Achaans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken paines to restore back their servants, so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily understood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater part, being openly rehearsed by the Prætor, before the Council. But Callierates took the matter very angrily; and bade them be advised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plain device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithal he took upon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achaans beforehand acquainted with the War, that was comming up on Perseus from Rome. Hee told told them how Philip had made preparations for the same war; how Demetrius had been made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly, He rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarnæ, upon the Dardanians; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behavior, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he advised them to expect the event of things, and not over-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Calliocrates was too earnest in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabbinner, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himself too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perseus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that he had lovingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so, why might not the Acheans, as well as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanity required? Nevertheless Calliocrates was grown a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not over-stiffly gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and answer made the whilst, That since the King had only sent a letter with an Embassador, they knew not how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to do as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needs urge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to give audience: which was proof sufficient to one that could understand of the condition wherein they lived. For harkening to this advice of Calliocrates, they were soon after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of War was given.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honors him greatly, and condemns his enemies the Rhodians with the causes thereof. The usual journeys of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree war against him, and send him defiance. Other things concerning the justice of this war.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had been troubled about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates, his neighbours. He had taken the right course, in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their authority, would end the business to his content. But in conclusion, by the help of the Kings, Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the war himself; and brought his Enemies to seek and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to give them. After this, being at good leisure, he began to consider how the affairs of Macedon stood under Perseus. His hatred to Perseus, was very great: and therefore he was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy was as great, and withal notorious. Now, besides his ancient and hereditary quarrel with the Macedonian, it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honors (whereof the Greeks, prodigal in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wax every where stale: whilst Perseus, either by his currying favour or by the envy born to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignity, He stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, open War. But final pleasure found he in these poor and indirect courses of revenge.

The Lycians could not be saved by their Patronage from severe and cruel chastisement, given to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostility, little different from robberies, made him hateful to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Acheans, as too unmeasured, misbecoming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to have regarded, had he not been too vainly ambitious) beset him; especially for his being over-servicable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdom, which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redress hereof, he thought it vain to strive any longer with bounty, against such an Adversary, as by hopeful promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the general favour. And therefore he resolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdom, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to persuade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some piece of the kingdom, as he had been rewarded, for the like service, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where though he had little to say; which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange novelty, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turn the balance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania, that of Perseus himself against the Dolopians, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermeddling in business of his neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spie. He said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, of his own, money in a readiness to entertain ten thousand Mercenaries for ten years, armes to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten years, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoyle, or to take from his own Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to consider, that King Selencus, the son and successor of Antiochus the Great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Selencus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassadors from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the envy to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to hear of amity with Philip, were now grown marvellously well affected to his son. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his kingdom, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify unto the most saying, that he thought it his duty to forewarn them: since it would be to himself a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making war upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to believe that the Romans stood in fear of Perseus, lest he should set upon them in Italie. Nevertheless, forasmuch as they loved not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intentment. Now thought it were so that he told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seem greater. For if upon any relation made by their own Embassadors, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them; their injustice and oppression would have been most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his own kingdom, as far as from Asia, to bid them look to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtaine their own right and security? Toward this justification of the war, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto, their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well known, helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speak; and with matter of reprimination. The vanity, either of him, or of some about him, seems to have disclosed all: when the weariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearful apprehension; against which, it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pomp conveyed by sea unto Persus, his bride Ladice; which friendly office, as the Macedonian bountifully required, so the Romans des-spightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were settling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes, Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their own protection any people or Nation by them vanquished: and that the Lycians were by them assigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meer vassals, but as dependants and associates. For proof hereof, they referred themselves unto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masanius, the Aetolians, and all other Kings or Estates that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to find themselves agreed, if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subjects might easily be made their fellows, whenever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate: which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Persus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the ears. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors, which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassy they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacify them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Persus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might favour of hostility; but that, if his travel in this kind proved vaine, then would he be ready to defend himself by armes, and stand to the chance of war, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These big words may seem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whole faint heart: they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Persus himself might, at this time, think to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman servitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general expectation, and the good affection born to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weakness of spirit, unanswerable to a work of such importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to fortune; which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heat, it appears by his daring to adventure soon after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make war upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there do sacrifice to Apollo. Persus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his own hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or four stout Russians to do the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud-wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence assault the King, whom they forcibly bruited with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work, such was the opportunity of the place which they had chosen; but fear of being being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their own companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveyed away to the little Ile of Egina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonice the daughter of king Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbered among the rare examples of brotherly love, That when the king turned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his duty, as in former times, received none other check than, that he should forbear to marry with the Queen until he were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never speak of these matters, but bequeathed at his death, unto the same brother, both his wife and kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the king his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in special favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readiness, to have transferred the kingdom from his brother to him. By such concord of brethren was the kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld; as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Persus.

It is likely that Persus was very glad, when he understood that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saved all from discovery. But as he was deceived in the main point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived, so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the less material. For he had written to one Praxe, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this business: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius, a Roman Embassador, then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece one Raminus, a Citizen of Brundisium; who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, laden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador; and thereof discharged himself. Brundisium was the ordinary Port for ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Raminus a faire house; wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journeying to and from. By occasion of such his hospitality, he was commended to Persus; and invited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming he was much made of, and shortly, with more familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets: The summe of all was, That he must needs do a turn, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality; sure in operation; yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for fear lest the vertue of this medicine should be cryed upon himself. But being once at liberty, he discovered all. Raminus was but one man; and one whom the King had never seen before, nor was like to fee againe; and therefore, besides that the Kings denial ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Persus, in time short following, answer for himself, and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or the other: yet withal professing, That such objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the rightfulness of making war upon him; but rather unto a subject pleading for his life in judgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proof (which might have been easie) than any that we finde by them produced: yet the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held to inexcusable. And as for his Royal Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make war upon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if he might not send men to waste the kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he not send men to waste the kingdom of Macedon, or to destroy the league to destroy the send Russians to murder the King? If it were no less breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, then by violence of the sword, was it lawful for him to do it by poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed war against him; and sent Embassadors dours to denounce it unto him, unless he would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to have been so confident in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he desired not war, yet he did not fear it: or at least he thought by thew of courage, to make his enemies more calm. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them do their errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long bin collecting against him, and wherewith Enmenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samos, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the evidence, brought against him by Rammin and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, wel-beloved, and wel-friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage, calling the Romans, greedy, proud, insolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meer spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect, That he would no longer stand to the league made between them and his father, and renewed by himself indeed only for fear, but wished them to descend to more equal conditions; whereupon he, for his part, would advise, as they might also do for theirs.

Polyb. Leg. 9.

Liv. lib. 33.

In the form of the league between Philip and the Romans, as is set down by Polybins, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future, excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livie inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden to make any war abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so bind the Kings hands, that he could no more make war abroad, then if he had been restrained by plain covenant. And thus might that seem an article of the peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not bear defensive arms, without their permission; then had Perseus very just reason to find himself aggrieved. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make war in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become lawful for him to chastise his own Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as unjust, he ministred occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three dayes. But either he should have been less vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serve him to undertake the war, he should courageously have managed it, and have slipt to work immediately, whilest the Enemie was unprepared, not have lost opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

§. VI.

The Romans solicit the Greeks, to joyn with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timoroulness of Perseus. Marcus a Roman Embassador deludes him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field, and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this war. Of Tempe in Thessaly, and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had, but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans: fights with them, knows not how to use his victories, sues for peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus having the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Bæotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the war against Perseus. The vex the Greeks their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabandians.

SO long had the Romans been seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the war: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunity of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to believe, that their own strength was such as would prevail in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their unreadiness a smal help, towards examining the disposition of the Greeks and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to fear, that all of the Greeks or other Eastern people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the diffention between their several Estates; howsoever the generality of them were inclined the same way. Nevertheless Embassadors were sent to deal with them all; and to crave their help against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no less ample manner, than heretofore they had yeilded it against Philip and Antiochus, in wars pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now grown well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and understood that not only such as made refusal, but even they who might seem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this business was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their help to the Romans: the Achaïans and Rhodiens, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had balked in some part of their duty. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have seen the ruine. The vulgar sort was every where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybins the chief of Historians was one: who though he judged the victory of Perseus, like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wished he the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greeks might recover perfect liberty: for his endeavours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears, that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Achaïans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their fear, may be justly imputed unto the timorous demeanor of Perseus himself. He had undertaken a war, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdome, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought over-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speak the enemy faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every final thing would serve to terrifie him: and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by

by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those which had afflicted him: little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his army; taking by force or composition some few Towns, and soliciting all to joyn with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martius, the chief of those Embassadors, and a man of more fineness in cunning than was usual among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gave out such comfortable words, that the King entreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him, yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied: and advised him to give the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a truce was agreed upon. This had Martius his desire: which was, to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could have been in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee suffered a most convenient season, of winning upon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bin with some victory: publishing a copy of the disputation between him 20 and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not only to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poor helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than meervanity, his own safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his fearfulness might seem excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine unto the Greeks; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly 30 their own: had it not been his office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give such a manly beginning to the war, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Boeotians also, who had entered of late into a strict society with the Macedonians, renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission under a general form; but caused their severall Towns to make covenant apart, each for it self: to the end, that be- 40 ing thus distracted into many little Common-wealths, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebel) have such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the Cite of Thebes. This work, of separating the Boeotians from Thebes their head, was more than Agesilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedaemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the virtue of Epaminondas and a few brave Citizens, than was the society with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedaemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where vaunting what he had wrought by 50 his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should think expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent, audience was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their matter was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreaty, would serve their turn: the Senate being resolute before hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the wals, in the Temple of Bellona (the usual place of giving audience to open open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome enter the City) and had only the short warning of eleven daies, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courtlye serve alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a like y mean, both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Consul was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to have roused Perseus, and have made him lay aside all coward- 10 ly hope of getting pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while. Whether it were not better to offer himself tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enjoy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsell prevailed; which also was the wisest, and so would have proved, had it been stoutly and wisely followed. He now began, as if the war had not begun untill now, to do what should have been done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a Town in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, he forward to Citium. His army 20 he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, whereof about twelve thousand foot, and a thousand horse were strangers, of sundry nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his own Macedonians. These he animated with lively speeches, laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolency of the Romans, the goodness of his cause, the greatness of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to help him with money and victuals, according to their severall abilities. He gave them thanks: but answered, That his own provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his 30 engines and munition.

Out of his own Kingdome he issued forth into Thessaly: knowing that the Romans were to pass through that Countrey, in their journey towards him. Some Towns of Thessaly opened their gates unto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he barked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he won by force. Of these last was Nyle, a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a fall; which the Townsmen rashly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of war was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Scutaria and Con- 40 nus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the Straights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sicurius, a Towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa, where he rested a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessaly, with four thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aid as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Misamis sent thither his son Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Artaabes the Cappadocian, by reason of 50 his affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this war; perhaps because Eumenes himself began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had been in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemy (though Ptolemy was then young, and under Tutors) had businesse of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Centius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good-will. This King had four and fifty ships, riding in the haven of Dyrachium, uncertain to what purpose: all which Lucretius took away, after a very kinde sort, making shew to beleieve, That for none other end than to serve the Romans, their good friend Genius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoever Genius thought in the beginning, he foolishly lost both his Kingdome and himself, in the end of this war, by offering, rather than giving, his help to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought over the sea, Licinius came into Thessaly: to sojourn with a painfull journey, through the mountainous country of A- 10
thamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plains, the Romans must needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himself and his wearied army, by the River Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender help, that could enable him to deal with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keep his trenches, untill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himself in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of Thessaly, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautiful valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often used at large, to signify the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it self was not great; but adding to it those huge mountains Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poësie) with their Spurs or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unless they would make an hungry journey, through the country of the Thessalians, as in the former war with Philip, they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perseus therefore had no small advantage, by being master of the straights leading into Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by 30 himself spending of time he had not lost it. For if in descending the ragged passages of these mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea to win upon them (for a while) every year more than other, both in strength and reputation: unquestionless he might have done far greater things, had he seized upon the straights of Aoni, which his father once kept, and defended all the Country behinde the mountains of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficulty, must the Romans have either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found; or else have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needfull, unto the mercy of Seas that were very dangerous, if they would have sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courses 40 they once deviled, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present war. It may perhaps be said, that the Greeks, and others whom the King must have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his father in the former war. The Asiatians, upon whom the Asiaticum depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall find anon) even as soon as they met with Perseus. The Boeotians, how politically soever Marius had wrought with them, adventured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they have done, if he at first had done his best? The Rhodian, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himself, after a while began to waver, when they saw 50 things go better with Perseus, than they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginnings, and increased the number of his well-willers; yea and bought down with money (as he might have done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage over Greece, and to render the liberty, by them given, entire, which otherwise was but imaginary. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason have bin expected.

expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearfull company running from their enemies, till some river stay their flight; are there compeled by meer desperation to do such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would have won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that war, whereof he should have sought the honour, he left his friends that it would have stood by him, and gave them cause to provide for their own safety: yet being over-taken by necessity, he chose rather to set his back to the mountains of Tempe, and defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driven into such misery, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessaly, 10 it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perilled. Wherefore we must be contented with the sum.

The Consul having no desire to fight, untill such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches, & lay still encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which persuaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter unto a hasty triall. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by waisting the land of the Theracians their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victory his own. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes 30 his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertain skirmish. The Captain, and some other of these were slain: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, a while toge ther, Perseus continued offering battell: which they still refused. Hereby his boldness much increased; and much more his reputation: to the grief of those who being so far come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell upon them by their enduring these bravadoes. The Town of Sycerium, where Perseus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up four hours of the morning; but he 40 was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a lodging, seven miles nearer to the enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sun rising. His coming at such an unusual hour, filled the Camp with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him only his horse and light armature, that were unfit to assail the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to try their fortune: he himself remaining in the Camp, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedo- 50 nian Kings, for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retreat) with little losse of his own. But he discovered his weaknesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to counsel given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great fear lest he should assault their camp; and to that purpose, upon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unfit for: he nevertheless took it for sound advice, which indeed was timorous and base, To work warily, and moderate his victory; by which means it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater, and had he won the 50 Roman Camp, his friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, even when he had the victory; what else did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him: At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. He had slain of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot he had slain about two thousand: losing of his own no more than twenty horse and forty foot. The Roman Camp, after this disaster, was full of heavinesse and fear: it being much doubted that the enemy would set upon it. Enneus gave counsell to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though alhamed to professe, by fodoing, in what fear he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud termes, to draw upon himself a greater calamity. So he passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Ætoliens were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a traitorous meaning, than any true fear, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especiall mark, had been observed to be the first which turned their backs: an observation likely to cost them dear, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks too might learn, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shun indignation, or incurr favour, then must they adventure no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Army. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, he not untill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whether they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have routed them whilst they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vain to tell what might have been done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, The Gentlemen of Rome, out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoils of them without resistance, as yielding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the glory of his action; dividing the spoils among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour found. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid way between Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily perswaded to use the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consul, and offered to yield unto the same Conditions, where n his Father had been bound to the Romans; if the war might so take end. It were needlesse here again to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadors might go to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; save that Perseus would yeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A mainly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in adversity. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having received an answer so peremptory he still persisted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himself back to Sicyonum. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagetus the son of Masaniassa, with the aide before mentioned. This distance between the King and them, caused the Romans to wax the more bold in making their harvest about which businesse they ranged over all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gave him hope to do some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon those that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have sised on the sudden: but the alarm being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the forrageis; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilst he strove to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul, by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great battell, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall back into Macedon; as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appear hereafter. He left all behinde him, save only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight unto Comus, hoping to have taken

it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back unto the Perrabians and others; from whom he won some towns, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry towns thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul took, may seem not to have belonged unto the Thessalians, unless, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got some part of Thessaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may think it strange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his own will, should not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty towns, which by that same distraction of the Bœotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had been. The causes hereof were to have been fought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lærtius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoyleing them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreme oppression he could have driven them so far. Neither was Licinius the Consul undiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Only this is said in general; That in the war which he made, he cruelly and covetously demeaned himself.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hofilius the Consul, and Horrensus the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hofilius shewed more of his industry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the war against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war upon his Kingdome, after that the Consul had sought passage in vain over certain mountains, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Army of four thousand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Visciana, a border town of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose only to train him into danger; sallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chased him so far; that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this town of Visciana, shortly after became Roman: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very soon recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Colys a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirot, revolted from the Romans, on the other, Perseus likewise made a painfull journey into Ætolia; where he was promised to be admitted into Sirius, that was the strongest City in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction, yet in his return home, he took in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newses, that Ap. Claudius was again thoroughly beaten by Cleonus, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian war under Hofilius. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gave out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and main to advance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortus that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopon men, and together with him, his son Polybius, who soon after was Generall of the Achaean horse, but more notable by that excellent history which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The sum of the accusation should have been; That these were not hearty friends unto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lack of opportunity than for any love to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, & give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætoliens: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Council that approved the motion: as also among the ACHÆSIANS; there were that entreated to have Roman garriſons beſtowed in their towns. But neither the one nor the other of theſe propoſitions took effect. They of the Roman faction, accuſed not only ſuch as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but alſo the good Patriots; making it no leſſe than a matter of treaſon, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary ſide, there wanted no ſome, who roundly told theſe pick-thanks of their baſe flattery; rating them openly, in ſuch ſort, that one of them hardly eſcaped being ſtoned, even in preſence of the Embaſſadours. Thus was all full of accuſations, and excuſes: among which the Embaſſadours carried themſelves, as men that could beleeye none ill; though it were well enough known what they thought. The beſt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and publiſhed, to this effect: That it ſhould be free for all men, to reſuſe obedience to any Roman Magiſtrate, impoſing any burthen for the preſent war, unleſſe it were ſuch, as the Senate had likewiſe thought meet. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or ſeemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that ſtanding on privilege hereof, reſuſed to fulfill every commendement, were numbred among the Patriots; which in the end of this war proved little better, if not worſe, than to have been Traytors. The Senate was driven to let down this order, by reaſon of many & vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magiſtrates, and eſpecially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortenſius. Lucretius was condemned in a great ſum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their ſubjects oppreſſed. Hortenſius being ſtill in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embaſſages that came to Rome about this time, either to ſeek redreſſe of injuries, or to offer their ſervices it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a town of the leſſer Aſia, there was preſented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a moſt baſe piece of flattery. Theſe Alabanders brought three hundred horſemens targets, and a crown of gold, to beſtow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a deſire to gratifie the Romans with ſome exquisite token of their duſtfull obedience, wherein they would be ſingular, and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple, unto the town Rome, and appointed anniversary games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddeſſe. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and the like vain men, that would be thought gods, or at the ſhamefull flattery of ſuch as beſtowed upon men, and not the moſt virtuous of men, divine honours; when he ſees a town of houſes, wherein powerfull men dwell, worſhipped as a goddeſſe; and receiving (without ſcorn of the givers, or ſhame of the Preſent) the title of Deity, at the gift of ſuch a rascal City as Alabanda?

Q. Martius the Roman Conſul, with extreme difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perſeus in abandoning Tempe. The town of Diem quitted by Martius, repaired & ſanctified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill ſucceſſe. Their affairs in ſhort deſcrib'd. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius ſent Embaſſador to Martius from the Achaens. Polybius his beſt wiſdom beneficiall to the Achaens. King Bunneſes grows averſe from the Romans. Perſeus negotiates with Antiochus, and Eumenes. His falſe dealing with Genctus King of Illyria; whom he draws into the Roman war. He ſends Embaſſadours to the *Rhodian*s; who vainly take upon them to be arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perſeus loſeth a mighty ſucour of the *Bactrian*s, by his wretched perſonamy.

AFTER two years of the Macedonian war, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the war began; which had been thought likely to reform all thoſe Countries, and bring them to what paſſe the Romans deſired; as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Thyrian ſide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, to ſuſpect what the iſſue of the war might prove, and thereupon to become wiſe for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, Licinius, & Hoſtilius the Conſuls, had one after the

the other ſpent their time in vain, ſeeking way into Macedon; and deſcend the glorious enterprize of conqueſt, by many loſſes received. The Roman Admirals had ſo demeaned themſelves, that many towns even of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the fear was great on the Roman ſide; and the Army much leſſened, not only by casualties of war, but by the facility of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſul himſelf (for they laid the blame on upon the other) in licenſing the ſouldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded unto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheless was more than he knew how to do; though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. He began hoſtly to ſet the war on foot, which a long time had ſlept. And he began the right way: not ſeeking to force the ſtraights that were ſurely guarded, but taking pains to climb the mountains which were thought able to forbid all paſſage over them, without help or need of any cuſtody. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, diſtributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit aſſent. But the Conſul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be diſcovered by the Enemy, or to break through all oppoſition, or at leaſtwiſe, to fight on as convenient ground, as they ſhould have that lay to ſtop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him ſour thouſand of his moſt expedient foot, to diſcover the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles: after which they had ſight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe piece of ground, and ſent back word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmayed at his arrivall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little loſſe on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountain, which gave ſcarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to return. Wherefore Martius took the only courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt: Part of his men he left with Pepilius, to attend upon the Macedonians; whiſt he, with the reſt, ſought a commodious about, and fought out wayes that never had been troden. Herein he found extreme difficulty: which notwithstanding he overcame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch journeys, through places uſuſt for habitation, he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make paths where none were, yea, where Nature might ſeem to have intended, that none ſhould be. So ſtep he found the deſcent of the mountains, in this way which he took: that of ſeven miles, which they travelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themſelves down, as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with rocks, that ſtood one over another, ſo upright, and cumbersome to get down; that their Elephants were afraid of that giddy proſpect, and caſting their governours, made a ſcramble poſſe, which affrighted the horſes, and bred great confuſion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous journey; there was nothing more deſired by the ſouldiers, than that they might be ſuffered to creep back again, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like unto falling draw-bridges whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the cliſt; the other ſuſtained by two long poſts, ſtaffed in the ground below. Upon theſe two poſts, or poles, (which indeed, not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould be either cut or broken) were faſtened two raſters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, between the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. Theſe were covered with planks and turfe; that they might ſeem continent with the ground; ſo to make the beaſts adventurous to go upon them. If there were a plain of any good extent from the foot of a rock, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of theſe; the poſts upholding the frame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſink down unto the next bridge; whence he was conveyed in like manner; to the third, and onward ſtill to the very bottome. Thus went they down ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appears, how thoroughly provided the Romans used to be in their journeys, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what inestimable pains they took in this descent, about the conveyance of themselves and all their carriages down the mountains. The next day they rested, staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps never, should have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set upon him from aloft. The third and fourth dayes journeys were like unto the first: save that custom, and the nearness to their wayes end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Persus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: since they fought with his men upon the passage, three dayes together, he lying so nigh, that he might well-near have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with fear; that he neither stirred 10 to help his own men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsell, late hearkening after the event. Four only passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it: the last, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seek any other way, must be faine to take such pains as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, save through the valley it self, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the foot of the huge mountain Olympus, about a mile 20 from the sea: of which mile, the River Helicon becoming the sea lake, and called Baphyas, took up the one half; the rest being such as might easily have been fortified. Besides all these, there was in the midst of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keep: where the spurs of the mountains, reaching far into the valley, drew near to the very banks of Peneus, a goodly and deep river which ran through it. Wherefore nothing had been more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Persus could have seen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable travell: but must needs have either perished for want of victuals, or been forced to return the same way that he came, if the King had made good the strait of Dium. To have returned, 30 and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get down, it seems a matter of impossibility: especially considering how the enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that Kingdom had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to win. But the cowardize of Persus did commend the counsell by them followed, as wise. For 40 he no sooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe; than he fared like one out of his wits, saying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all without battall. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haste; and straightwaies abandoned the Town. In the same vehemency of amazement, he sent a strait commandment to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire, and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drown the treasure, performed it as hastily as well as he could: though soon after, his master grew sorry for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings 50 Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their service, was this. Persus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction; caused them both to be slain. Also those poor men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were payed their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they fear, who are privie privy to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Persus would have gone surely to work, for the hiding of his fault, then must he so royally have behaved himself, that no man might beleieve him to be the author of any unworthy act or counsell. But his vertue was of no such capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountain) and Asclepiodatus from defence of the passages, where o they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed unto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have sped 10 as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to rejoyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a dayes journey, and gotten one town that yielded, he was compelled by meer lack of food for his men, to return back towards Thessaly. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessity, well appointed to have holpen him in the war: but having left behinde, at Magnesi, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Ca- 20 stles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by thoe wayes only might he be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corn, which was most desirously expected, he forsook Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worke thin foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had been worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountains: for otherwise it had been madnesse to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, he should be faine to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of war; since he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behooved him, to have prosecuted the action.

30 By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himself, understood his own error; sought to hide it by such poor means as have been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the River of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely used, would have been enough, not only to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace, but to have given him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the war upon fair conditions, and not to begin again in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hinderance. For lit- 40 tle or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the town of Heraclæa, standing on the River of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing upon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not given up for fear. After this, Martius did set a bold face towards Dium, as if he would have taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chief care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admirall to make attempt upon the Sea-towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assailed: but in vain. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times adventured forth of the Town, 50 were still put to the worfe. As for the Town it self; there was danger in coming near it, either by land or Sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the walls, and reached unto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall letting fall from thence, ran along by Enia, and Antigonea, (standing near to each of them; and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty ships of War: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admirall was bold to try his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Persus, before the town: which while the Romans were filling up, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence thence, for that it lay not upon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town-wall filled up with that earth, & covered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the town, by sapping the walls. To this work he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an alarm to the other side of the town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soon made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for joy, & ordering themselves for the assault, the Capitains within the town perceived what was done, & sallying forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch & the wall, of whom they flew about six hundred, and suffered few to escape unwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the town which King Enmenes assailed, a supply in 10 the mean while entering the town by sea) caused the siege to break up. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admirall had laid siege to it, but to keep the land about it from spoil; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibeas, whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly over their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Camp on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; ever since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessly) most unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harm befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining History of this war. For Martius persuaded the Rhodians by Agelipolis their Ambassador, who came to him at Heraeus themselves as mediators, and seek to finish the War. Now, although Polybius do most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perseus, 30 or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet since he made them of fear, it is like or of Antiochus, that somewhat had happened, which might make his fear seem not counterfeited. And so were the Rhodians moved to think of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, commending from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their business at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honour of some victory, wherein he had lately slain great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated; though 40 rarely plain great numbers of the fight, be not specified. And hence may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his Army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius his Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seem, that some blow had been taken on the Illyrian side; which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had been driven from some of the Towns which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaved himself like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craft-master, with a restless working diligence. This indeed neither proved his sufficiency, nor commended his honesty; since thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit; and nevertheless out of envie, vain-glory, or such delight as weak and busie headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Country. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hoplitius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessaly, Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriots among the Achaans, judged it expedient for their Nation to help the Romans, as in a time of adversity, whom in prosperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree, which passed: That the Achaans should send their whole power into Thessaly, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Army was levied: and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors unto Martius, to certify him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Army; and awaited the Consul's leisure till they came to Heraeus, where finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, whereinsoever it should be commanded. Martius took this very kindly; but said, That he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signify thus much: tarrying himself behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achaans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might do notable service, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plain reason. He called unto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to return home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achaans be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius, musing, and unable to resolve, whether it were for love to the Achaans, that the Consul was so earnest in this business; or rather for envie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himself could do nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Councell touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own self, and those of his party. For as he was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to help Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this case therefore, he had recourse unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessity of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, unless by speciall order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Achaans were favers, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himself ran into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policy of Martius, that King Enmenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in fear lest the fire, which he himself had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to overweigh all other passions: it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Enmenes did not so much as give any help to Martius; but coming to have joyned with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking, and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behind him certain horse of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to have done it. If this were true, and that his brother Attalus tarrying behind with the Consul, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Enmenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received, that Enmenes gave a willing ear to Perseus his desire of accord, for meer desire of gain. And it might well be, that covetousness drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoever it befall, Perseus caused Enmenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his adventilements, both to Enmenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love between a King and a free city: that the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the help of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the help of Attalus, Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Enmenes; and now Perseus assailed, assailed with help of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to think better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to look for any good conclusion of his war with the Egyptians, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to forsake from their war upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings: Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer, he began to offer a bargain of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no less weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised for his own part, That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine Neuer therein: and that for some greater quantity of money (how much I shinde not) he would also bring the Romans to descend unto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hostages. Perseus liked well to receive the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his own: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the business might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in press. Thus the two Kings did no more than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traitor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stir. Hereunto Perseus loved not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last cast, to deliver him from all his fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe; then did his fear urge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents which Gentius demanded: for a recompence. So the bargain was soon made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus, to the end that all his Army might have comfort, by such access of strength to their party. Presently upon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians to take upon them, as arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the war to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Marius the Consul was no less desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors, gave an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vain glory of the Rhodians was throughly chastised; and more thoroughly should have been, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus, without laying out one ounce of silver. Now faine he would have hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the War: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantaneus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Gentius exhorted him daily to begin the War by land and sea, whilst the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantaneus: who delivered it to the young King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed up with the seal of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands upon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessity to make war with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, under one Clondicus a petty King, ten thousand horse and ten thousand foot of the Gauls, which were were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarnæ. These had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdom, Perseus sent one to them, desiring their Captains to come visit him, whom he promised to gratify with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to give their souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy Master, that the Gauls will not stir one foot further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon took counsell: if to utter his own opinion before men so wife that they would not contradict him, were to take counsell. He made an invective against the incivility and avarice of the Bastarnæ: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdom. Five thousand horse of them he said would be as many as he should need to use; and not so many, that he should need to fear them. It had been well done, if any of his Counsellors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, since without any danger to the Kingdom, they might be let out, by the way of Perrebia, into Thessaly: where wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoil, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they won any victory or not. This, and a great deal more, might have been alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had been with them before, was sent again, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmur of those many thousands that had been drawn so far to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now again, Whether he had brought the money along with him to pay those five thousand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifting excuses, the Bastarnæ returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this crafty messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the sum. But of this painfull Office he was very soon discharged by L. Æmilius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteen dayes after his setting forth from Italy, brought the kingdom of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a king to foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul. His journey. He forceth Perseus to discamp. He will not hazard battell with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. Æmilius his superstition. The battell of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdom: which hastily yeelds to Æmilius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yeelds himself to the Roman Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Æmilius.

BY the War of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity so moved them, that either * they decreed that Province to L. Æmilius Paulus, Plut. in vid. Acqui. without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, between him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it upon him, than that so worthy a man was advanced to the dignity of a second Consulship. He refused to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; untill by Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the War, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being throughly known to be such, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a strong supply, not only to the Consul, but unto the Navie, and likewise to the Army that lay between Illyria and Epirus; from which Ap. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Æmilius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much gravity and authority. He requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this war, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their advice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearsay, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amylius, who died valiantly in the Battell of Canus, might well be living in some of their memories; which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his business within the City being dispatched, Amylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey, with an especial hope of men, that he should finish the war, though that he should finish it so soon & happily, was more than could have bin hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium; whence, when the wind came fair, he set sail at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Coreyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi; where having done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Camp, and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fifteen dayes remaining, in which he finished the war.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; having spared no labour of men & of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was foordable in dry weather: so as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lack of fresh water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea shore and the foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amylius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shore; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shore that want's them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking up his lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Town of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath been shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessary to search another way: which by enquiry was soon found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perrabia, hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a fair journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof, or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the adventure, they fearing lest it would prove such a piece of work as had been their march over Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and ability to command. He had reformed, even at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the souldiers among other good lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this enterprise; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Amylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own sons by nature, but adopted, the one of them, by a son of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretians, but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, upon the mountain, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance they might do notable service against those that should climb up unto them; yet when the darkness took away their aim, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deal with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the business about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet, where victuals were provided for their journey at being noised, that they were to run along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the country. All the way that they were passing the mountains (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to let upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to do good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-near all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Amylius employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light ar-mature had advantage at far distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raised on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vain. Yet Amylius persisted as he had begun, & recontinued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might have served to teach the Macedonians, that some greater work was in hand: since otherwise a good Captain, as Amylius was known to be, would not have troubled himself with making such bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked only unto that which was before his eyes: until his men, that came running fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the camp, that the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himself no lesse (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Camp was broken up, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custody of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good success in their journey. It may well be, that they slept until the Romans came somewhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their arrows and slings could do little service, were beaten at handy-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had been effected by Martius in the 20 year foregoing; but was closed up again, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunity.

Perseus was in an extreme doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Towns, and so to linger out the War: having been taught by the last years example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But far worse counsell prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazzard of battell: fearing belike to put himself into any one Town, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures always are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even that same that Amylius, or any invader, should have desired. So a place was chosen near unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There he abode the coming of the enemy; who stayed not long behind him. As soon as the Romans had sight of the Kings Army; which with greater fear than discretion, had hastened away from them, forsaking the Camp that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to give battell immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul, praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Amylius told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Camp wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save only the bare ground whereon they trod. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himself unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battell, gave charge to have the Camp measured out and entrenched behind the Army; where, into at good leisure, he fell back, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest it was hoped both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their own Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himself by the backwardness of the enemy, who advanced no further; but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Praetor, foretold unto the Consul, and with his good liking unto the Army, an Eclipse of the Moon, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be known long before it was seen. It was the manner of the Romans, in such eclipses to beate Pans of Brass, and Basons, as we do in following swarm of Bees; thinking that thereby they did the Moon great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpitius converted their superstition into admiration of his deep skill, when they saw it verified. Con-

trariwife, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their tation, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigious betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was so whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses do signifie, or cause any alteration in civill affairs, and matte s that have small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of observation it is, how superstition captivates the widsome of the worst, where the help of true religion is wanting. Amylinus, though he were sufficiently inft-usted concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernatural thing, nor above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himself with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his duty to this Moon, and congratulating with sacrifice her delivery, as soon as she shone out bright again: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish devotion, yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for war, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good luck in the entrails of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victory to Amylinus: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new goddess, lately canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, founder of their City, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deity; or (if a God of elder date were more authentick) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of military affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrary to the rules of war.

Now concerning the Battell, Amylinus was thoroughly perswaded, that the king meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not have stayed at Pydna, when as, a little before, his leisure served, to retire whither he listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sun was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, & Amylinus sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clock in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over-carnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the river, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank, whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this horse over to their own side. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was slain. His Countymen seeing this, halted to revenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slain him over the river. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battell, accordingly as the manner of his country, & the arms wherewith they served, did require. The ground was a flat level, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there, whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King, having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himself into Pydna: there to do sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the lesse marvell, that he durst adventure battell, since he had bethought himself of such a stratageme, whereby to save his own person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose unreasonable devotion could be no better than hypocrisie. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battell, he found it no better than lost: and he, in looking to his own safety, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could do no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amylinus was thereat much astonished; that the Pelignians rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-borne, many of them slain, and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apiece towards an hill. These were the things that fell out averse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding is said to have rent his coat-armour for grief. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the battell, was the same which doublest the Consul expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty or almost the impossibility of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming so to passe, admonished the Consul what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little use, when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targetters; according to the direction given by Amylinus, when he saw the front of the enemies great battell become unequal, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequal resistance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavailable against many small squadrons, as it had been formerly in the battell of Cynosephale: yea this form of embattailing was found unerviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike distressed, it would break off itself, though here were little such inconvenience of ground, as had been at Cynosephale. Chap. 4. §. 14.

Perseus, when he saw his battell begin to rout, turned his bridle presently, and ran amain towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witnessing the little good service which they had done. As for the poor foot, they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew above twenty thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost in that battell, only some fourscore, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, overtook the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himself: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company disperied themselves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For he fell to devising upon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himself: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella, he found his Pages and household servants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battell, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholy time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unseasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in fear, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief, he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Enmenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians, more for love of his money than of him. To these he gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fifty talents, though shortly he could need them of some part thereof; making shew as if he would have redeemed it, but never paying the money. The third day after the battell he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Townes-men to fidelity, with tears: and his own speech being hindered by tears, appointed Evander to speak what himself would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chief care to look well to themselves. Upon the first fame of the overthrow, they had emptied their town of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth under colour of a gainfull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bad Evander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himself and the treasure which he had there, in certain vessels that he found in the river Styrmen, passed over the Ile of Samothrace: where he hoped to live safe, by privilege of the religious Sanctuary the rein.

of the religious Sanctuary therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the Kingdome fell into the power of Amylinus, within fo few daies after his victory. Pydnæ, which was nearest at hand, was the first that yielded. About six thousand of the soldiers, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the battell into that Town, and prepared for defence: the confused rubble of fo many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius, who had kept the passage over Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had been sent Embassadour to Genius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yielding themselves, and the Town of Beraæ, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the like meslage came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereaving the whole body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydnæ, stand any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Country: but opened their gates upon such termes, that the sack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Amylinus sent abroad into the Country, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: he himself marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while he shall have more.

It was soon understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuary in the Temple at Samos: thrace: his own letters to the Consul confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such mean condition, that his case was pitied, for that he wanted the service of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire favour: which though he begged in terms ill befeceming a King, yet fince the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that some might be sent to confer with him about matters of his present estate. Nevertheless, in this conference, he was marvellous earnest, that he might be allowed still to retain the name of King. And to this end it was, perhaps, that he had so carefully preserved his Treasures, unto the very last: flattering himself with such vain hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his desire to live at ease, and to be called King. Yea, it seems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a desire to live in this Isle of Samos: both for that in one of his consultations about the War, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedonia, for * such a paltry Iland; and for that he offered to lay up the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he findes it otherwise. They urge him to give place unto necessity, and without more ado, to yield to the discretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is so far against his minde, that the conference breaks off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samos Brutus. Octavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assays, as well by terrible threats, as by fair language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for fear of imprisonment, he had now already imprisoned himself. When all would not serve, a question was moved to the Samosbracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy privilege of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samosbracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, that Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof unless he can clear himself in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence borne to his Majesty, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himself is charged with the same crime. But what will this avail, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willeth Evander to have consideration of the little favour that can be expected at the R-

mans hand; who are like to be presidents and overseers of this judgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where though he had a good plea, yet it could not help him. Of this motion Evander seems to like well: and either kills himself, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get payson wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had stuck to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him upon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, that the King hath lost the priviledge of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm so much, who shall dare to gainsay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that also lyable to dispute, which preservs him from captivity, he purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, unto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oraandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship, who easily was persuaded to wait the King thence. With all secrecy the Kings money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carryed aboard by night; and the King himself, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only * Philip. Plutarch in evit. Amil. Liv. lib. 42. Liv. lib. 42. Lib. lib. 42.)
30 ming to the Sea-side, he found no Oraandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the money to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shoar: who had stayed so long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ran therefore amain towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken, he hid himself in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ran up and down making inquiry; till Ottavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should have their lives and liberry, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yield themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ien, a Thesalonian, to whom the King had given the custody of his children, delivered them up to Ottavius. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his son Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, rendered himself and made the Roman victory compleat. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this war to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdome by arms, and himself by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have bin wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Amyntus; before whom 40 he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Amyntus used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a minde, made war upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the people at Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectfully entreated, he was committed prisoner to
O. Aelius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end there-50 withall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then known, was now translated unto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

ABOUT the same time, and with like celerity, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the money should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and drave him into * Scodra. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the King's presence, made it seem impossible to be won, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victory; and therefore presented his Army before the walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were it seems, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, he desired truce for three daies, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hands on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such meditation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison, where they were still alive. Having obtained three daies respite, he passed up a River, within half a mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Cavacantius was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Scodra. He sent messengers craying access unto the Prætor before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yielded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his kingdom, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were presently given up. So this war ended in thirty daies: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun, until Perseus, one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon after their victory over Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look tyrannically upon those that had been unmanly toward them before, whilst the war with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome; when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their errand again. This they performed with a bad grace, saying, that they were sent from Rhodes to make an overture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this war was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Romans did congratulate with the Senate and people of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassy to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should to be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the City, beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion; and not to prosecute them with vengeance, for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any any whit averse from the Romans in the late War of Macedon, were either taken and committed, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for fear, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace, and less would have done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a mild sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing war against Rhodes they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to ransack, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not esteemed; but thought themselves better without it, as equal friends.

With the like, or greater severity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Amyntus himself made progress through the Country, visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrius were slain at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman soldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redress was such as required not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Country, he feasted like a King, with excessive cheer; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome, some, to give order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usual in such cases; and some, to visit the affairs of Greece. The Kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Amyntus and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed unto the Kings, was lessened by half. As for the rest; the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent captive into Italy, with their wives and children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Lawes of the Country were abrogated, and new given by Amyntus. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to do, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not subjects to Rome, the things done to them could deserve no better name than meer tyranny, yea, and shameless perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custom, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the 40 Oathes of confederation seem of no validity. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unserviceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome, where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands; and in that respect, though they were no subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for using them as traitors, or at least as enemies. But since only two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no less affected in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King; this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyranny. With the Acheans these Embassadors were to deal more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong; (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manliest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of sign, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Acheans could be suspiciously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callistates, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their service to the Romans; but only such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for fear of Rome, the season served fitly to rank the Acheans with the rest.

And

And hereto Callicrates was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if some sharp order were not now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achaens: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. He said, that some of the chief among them, had with money and other means befriended Perseus. This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence given, he would name unto them. After sentence given (cried out the whole assembly) what justice were this? Name them first, and let them answer, which if they cannot well doe, we will soon condemn them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Pretors, as many as 10 had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise have been friend to Perseus: whereof if any man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were the best way for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not until he had cited above a thousand, willing them to appear and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the captivity of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause, than their love unto their Countrey, to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure that virtue, and regard of the publick liberty should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achaens. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honesty had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achaens, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrey, that these men should return into Achaia. Neither could any solicitation of the Achaens, who never ceased to importune the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all; 30 untill after seventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or having made offer to escape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole, yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, that the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amylius with mischievous subtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to use the liberty bestowed upon them by the people of Rome; hee 40 sent unto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of every City. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had, and sent along with them, into every of their Towns, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gave secret instructions to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed, they should fall to sack, every one the Town wherein to he was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and ten Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiers; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fifty thousand of that Nation made slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as having favoured Perseus. But since they among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already sent into Italy, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in general, was not only at the present in good obedience, but had even in this war done good service to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the lesse marvellous that God was pleased to make Amylius childlesse, even in the glory of his triumph, how great soever otherwise his virtues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad, it will appear by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speak, we must say somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himself, and of his affairs about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The war of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

- 10 Antiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reign and life. He died the six and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolemy Epiphanes; while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Justin) of Jupiter. He left behind him three sons, Seleucus, Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Ptolemy Epiphanes King of Egypt. Seleucus, the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sons; reigned in Syria twelve years, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpicius: though Iosephus give him but seven. A Prince, who as he was slothfull by nature, so the great losse which his father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing any great affair. Of him, about three hundred years before his birth, Daniel gave this judgement, Et stabit in loco ejus vilissimus & indignus decore regio. Dan. ix. 21. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall stand up a vile person, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all peace, because of the godliness of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliadorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery 30 at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successeur Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reign of this King, that the books of the Maccabees take beginning. Which books seem not to be delivered by one and the same hand. For the first book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his story; nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother & successor of this Seleucus, from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaeus (who died in the hundred threescore & seventeenth year of the Greeks in Syria) that first book treateth. The Author of the second book, although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian reign, and with the death of Nicanor, slain by Judas: remembering in the fourth 40 Chapter the practice of Jafon the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Sanctus, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembering in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himself directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome, repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Iosephus adds, that the name of the Lacedaemonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and 50 were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth year of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he usurped from his brothers son.

Ptolemy Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven years King of Egypt.

Ptolemy Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt four and twenty year, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philop of Macedonia, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them, whilst he was a child. But they found such other business to do along with the Romans, as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gave with his daughter in marriage, unto this Ptolemy, the Provinces of Calesyria, Phenice, and Judea, which he had won by his victory over Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Nevertheless, Ptolemy adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater security. He left behind him two sons; this Ptolemy Philometor, and Ptolemy Physcon, with a daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom he was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemy Philometor, so called (that is, the lover of his mother) by a bitter nick-name, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdome, his younger brother being set up against him. Physcon having a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himself in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, sought by all means possible to possess himself of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the son of Mnesitheus Embassadour into Egypt, and under colour to assist the Kings Coronation, he gave him instructions to persuade the governors of the young King Philometor, to deliver the King his Nephew, with the principall places of that Kingdome, into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephews safety and well doing. And the better to answer all arguments to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Foppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himself towards Jerusalem; where, by Jafon the Priest, (a Chaplain fit for such a Patron) he was with all pomp and solemnity received into the City. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traytor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Calesyria and Phenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heaven; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angell of God, and recovering again at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like ungodly practices. Presently upon the death of Seleucus, this Jafon, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtain the Priesthood for himself, offered unto the King three hundred and threescore talents of silver, with other rents and sums of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jafon, and his being over-reached by another in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Achaeans, when as that mischievous Callicrates, who had been too hard for all worthy and virtuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his own condition. It went thus:

One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more sore,
One Hawk than other Hawks more swift does fly.
So one most mischievous of men before,
Callicrates, false knave as knave might be,
Met with Menalcidas more false than he.*

And even thus fell it out with Jafon: who within three years after was betrayed, and overbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himself: Jafon the coupon being forced to flye from Jerusalem, and to hide himself among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem Antiochus marched into Phenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of war, and to prepare a fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty army of land-forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entered Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navie, and moved war against Ptolemaeus King of Egypt; but Ptolemaeus was afraid of him, and fled, & many were wounded to death. He won many strong Cities, and took away the spoils of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled

Prophecy of Daniel. He shall enter into the quiet and plentiful Provinces, and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers fathers. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria got a victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow to the Captains of Ptolemy, between Pelusium and the Hill Callis, after which he entered and sacked the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, he turned again, and went up towards Israel and Jerusalem with a mighty people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the shew-bread, and the pouring Vessels, and the Bells, and the golden Basins, and the Vail, and the Crowns, and the golden Apparell. He took also the Silver, and the gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian war that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian business. At what time he first laid claime to Calesyria, justifying his title by the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffly averring, that this Province had not been consigned over to the Egyptians, or given in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaeans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by severall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the war be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine war than by the terror of his arms, threatening destruction unto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weak estate, the younger almost ruined by his invasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weak soever these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof, and follow, at good leisure, his other business at Jerusalem, or elsewhere. So after the sack of Jerusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and others in those parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his absence he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the mean while, Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Jafon out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an In-come, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lyfismachus, stole certain Vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lievtenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Sosistratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Jafon) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeal, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himself into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoining as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweet Springs, banqueting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias to commit himself to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim privilege from the holiness of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Onely I say for mine own opinion, that the inconvenience is far lesse, to hold this book as Apocryphall, than to judge this fearfull shift which Onias (though a virtuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the book seems to do. As for this refuge, it could not save the life of the poor old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he conspired him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and persuaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; so he slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousness. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City; and in the same place where he had committed the wickedness against Onias, he was slain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life time done Justice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemy, a Traitor to Ptolemy Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death, who justly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his own outrageous will, and not by any regard of justice: since he revenged the death of Onias, he slew 10 those that were in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their case, yea, before the Scythians, they should have been heard as innocent. By reason of such his unsteadiness, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifies Noble, or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there seen throughout all the City of Jerusalem, forty dayes long, horsemen running in the air with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear-men, and as troops of Horsemen set in array, encountering and coming one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather fore-warnings of God, all Historiographers have delivered us, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian, a Star in the form of a sword appeared in the Heavens directly over the city, after which there followed a slaughter like unto this of Epiphanes, though far greater. In the Cymbrian wars, Pliny tells us, that Armies were seen fighting in the air from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountain poured out blood in stead of water, in or neer the City of Genoa; soon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, took end; whereof this notable signe gave warning.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her arms a white Hen, holding a Laurell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Laurell branch to be planted: of the Hen came a fair increase of white Poultry; and from the little branch there sprang up in time a Grove of Laurell: so that afterwards, in all triumphs, the Conquerours did use to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; and after the triumphs ended, to set it again in the same ground: which branches were observed, when they hapned to wither, to fore-tell the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last year of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken down with lightning. That the Jews did not think such strange signes to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling up-on God, and praying, that these tokens might turn to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning; so was this second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemy being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Uncle; thought it the best way to seek entrance into that royall City, rather by perswasion than by arms. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terror of the former siege: the Alexandrines, though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worse to live in scarcity of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Country; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor, in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the fear wherein he stood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his Army; yet had he left behind him a strong Garrison in Pelusium: retaining that City, which was the Key of Egypt, to his own life. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the news of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his Nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger brother unto him, which he gave in answer to all Embassadors; yet he now prepared to make a sharpe warre upon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Navy towards Cyprus, and drew his land Army into Calestria, ready to enter Egypt the 10 Spring following. When he was on his way as far as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolemy. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signifie what he required to have done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Army. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call back his Fleet, nor withdraw his Army, upon any other condition; than that Ptolemy should surrender into his hands, together with the City of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that he should also abandon and leave unto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them, for ever. For answer unto these demands, he set down a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nile, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemy in Arabia, as in Egypt it self, for Memphis, and all about it, received Antiochus, being unable to resist him. The King having now no stop in his way to Alexandria, passed on thitherwards by easie journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long ago. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a civil warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gave signification, that it would be much displeasing unto them, to have the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightful owners. More they could not, or would not do; being troubled with the Perseus; and therefore loath to provoke Antiochus too far. Nevertheless, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in need of helpe against their Uncle, who prepared and made open war against them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefices, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had been sustained with food from Egypt, in the war of Hannibal; when Italie lying waste, had neither corn nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatness, whereto the Achaans attained. And by the like helpe had Rhodes been defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turns, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requital: but with continuance of sutable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodian and Achaans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeer since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Achaans they desired in particular, that Lycostratus the brave warrior might be sent unto them, as General of all the Auxiliaries, and his son Polybius, General of the Horse. Hereunto the Achaans readily consented: and would immediately have made performance, if Callicrates had 50 not interposed his mischievous art. He whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousness to the Romans, or much rather envying those noble Captaines whose service the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce, which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding unto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (he said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such business, as might make them the less able to yeeld unto the Romans what help soever should be required in the Macedonian war. And in this sentence, he, with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with big words, as it were in behalf of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius

the late Consul had signified unto him, that the ROMANS were past all need of help: adding further, that a thousand foot and two hundred horse, might well be spared to the aid of their Benefactors, the EGYPTIAN Kings, without disabling their Nation to perform any service to the ROMANS; for as much as the ACHAENS could without trouble, raise thirty or forty thousand Souldiers. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken by the violence of Callierates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; he brought into the Theater where the Assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Marius: whereby the ACHAENS were desired to conform themselves to the ROMAN Senate; and to labour, as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadors to set Egypt in peace. This was an advice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make peace; but as in a time of greater business elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely that the ACHAENS should do any good in the same kind. Yet Polybius and his friends durst not gain-say the ROMAN Council, which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much distress; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadors, sent from the ROMAN Senate, perform as much as any Army could have done.

Audience had been lately given by the Senate, unto those Embassadors of Phrycon and Cleopatra: which having stayed more than a whole year in the City, brought nothing of their business to effect until now. The Embassadors delivered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no less than his brother and sister.

In this ambassage of Ptolemy, now requesting help from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had been before three or four years last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedonian War; either he, or Eulam, or Lenax (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affairs in such good estate, that not only he determined to set upon Antiochus for Galatrya, but would have interposed himself between the ROMANS and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassadors was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to live under protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subjects, he might have seemed to stand in no need of such protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to save both his kingdom & life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister shewed it self, even in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and beards overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branches of Olive. Thus they entered into the Senate, and there fell groveling and prostrate, upon the floor. Their garments were not so mean and mournful, nor their looks and countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey stood, they made a pitiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beseeching them to have compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had always remained friendly & faithful to the ROMANS. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favored this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations, as if they pleased but to send their Embassadors, and let Antiochus know that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate, then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or used any delay; then should Ptolemy and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realms, and make repair to Rome, with shameful dishonour to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extremest dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimus and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the war between those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Ptolemy, and then Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unless they surceased, and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or using delay. So these ROMANS, together with the Alexandrine Embassadors, took their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilst Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Army over Lusine, some forty miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his journey, when the ROMAN Embassadors met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Roll of paper; willing him to read those Mandates of the Senate before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while considered of the business, he told Popilius, That he would advise with his friends, and then give the Embassadors their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after he had stayed and pawsed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatsoever the Senate shall ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the ROMANS.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition, even in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling every particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Fernsalem after his return; like as if these things had rather been historified than foretold by the Prophet. As for the ROMAN Embassadors, they stayed a while, and sealed the kingdom of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had been, in the power of the EGYPTIAN, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the EGYPTIAN ships.

How the ROMANS were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates: The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Work.

BY this peremptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the ROMANS were grown, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had bin well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughness of his natural condition, & to give good language to the ACHAENS and ASOLIANS, when he went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of far lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse used any menacing termes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to grateulate the victory over Perseus; and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who had him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers kingdom for himself; for it should surely be given him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the faithfull counsell of Stratus a Phylian, whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keep his brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had bin sent, recounting his own services done to the ROMANS in the late war, * wherewithall he forgot not to make of his brother as good * Liv. lib. 41.

mention as he could : and finally requested, That the Towns of Amus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himself. * By his omitting to sue for his brother's Kingdom, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that business alone. Wherefore to make him understand how gracious he was; they not only granted all his desire, but in the presents which they gave unto him (as was their custom to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they used singular magnificence:

Nevertheless Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but went his way; contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Amus and Maronea: thereby making ineffectual their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdom of Perseus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest, Bumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had laid open unto these ambitious Potentates the way to his own doors. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an enemy, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in so doing, have avoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertain him as a friend, was more then their hatred to him, for his ingratitude: as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by virtue thereof sent him home, without expence of much farther complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had been at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better fashion. He had learned to behave himself as humbly as the proud Romans could respect or desire. For, entering into the Senate, he lay down, and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and saviours; as also he used to wear a Cap, after the manner of slaves newly manumitted, professing himself an enfranchised bondman of the people of Rome. He was indeed naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himself safe, though doing other wise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had been charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made to have some Towns added to his kingdom: whereto, because the grant would have bin unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his son, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectually the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Masaniassa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeed had Rome good leisure to devise upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masaniassa himself was shortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his sons, to congratulate the victory over Perseus, and offered to come thither himself, there to sacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his son rewarded; and he entertained to stay at home.

Corys the Thracian sent Embassadors to excuse himself touching the aide by him given to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to intreat, That his son, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at liberty, for convenient ransom. His excuse was not taken; since he had voluntarily obliged himself to Perseus, by giving hostages without necessity: Yet was his sonne given back to him ransom-free, with admonition, to carry himself better toward the

Romans

Romans in time following. His Kingdom lay between Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in fair terms.

As for those unhappy Kings Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Amynius and Anicetus. Perseus had often made suit to Amynius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but he still received one scornfull answer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himself. And surely, had he not hoped for greater mercy than he found, he would rather have sought his death in Macedon, than to have bin beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemency, wherof Amynius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that he, and his fellow King, had been led in chains through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do sacrifice, he should command the captives to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and misery of those that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted unto Perseus: yet so, that he had little joy of his life; but either famished himself, or (for it is diversly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custody; and so dyed for want of sleep. Of his sons, two died; it is uncertain how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such poverty ended the Royall house of Macedon: and it ended on the sudden; though some eight-score years after the death of that Monarch, unto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had known it before, that his own son should one day be compelled to earn his living by handi-work, in a painful Occupation; it is like; that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Sovereignty have commanded those poor men to be slain, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most undertrodden wretches, are all subject unto the One high Power governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our unhappinesse: in stead of that blessed counsel, Do as ye would be done unto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; we entertain that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will do what shall please my self. One hath said truly:

— Ubi — Et qui noluit occidere quonquam posse voluit.

Even they that have no murderous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most have a vain desire of ability to do evill without controll: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use it not to their own hurt. For who sees not that a Prince, by racking his Sovereign authority to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his own person) some one of his own sons or nephews to root up all his progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearnesse in blood, be driven to slatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governs one, the most unworthy of his whole house, yet reigning over all: the untimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such slattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend, are too good proofs hereof. Hereunto may be added, that the heir of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traitorously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heir apparent to the Crown of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such examples of the instability whereto all mortall affairs are subject;

subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitory gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked precedents, the evil that may fall on their own posterity: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happy that Country is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That * God is the first and sharpest Schoolemaster that can be desired for such Kings; as think this world ordained for them, without contrivement to turn it upside-down at their pleasure.

Now concerning the Triumph of Lucius Aemilius Paulus, it was in all points like unto that of T. Quintus Flaminius: though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own person, that was led along therein, as part of his own spoils; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasury, that from thenceforth, until the civil wars which followed upon the death of Julius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have been hindered by the soldiers; who grudget at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victory as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not given in adoption: of which, the one dyed five dayes before the Triumph; the other three dayes after it. This loss he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperity, since the joy of his victory was requited with his own private calamity, in stead of the publique.

About the same time, Octavius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Sarmathia; and Antioch the Pretor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Genius prisoner; made their severall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassadors from all parts; and Kings; either visiting the Imperiall City, or offering to visit her, and do their duties in person; were enough to lay up in Rome, some superbiams, Take upon thee the Majesty that thy deserts have purchased.

By this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the height. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted up, or cut down all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her down.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which have been preserved, and yet remain among us; and withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men have complained against infidelity, Time, Destiny, and most of all against the Variable success of worldly things, and Instability of Fortune. To these undertakings, these great Lords of the world have been stirred up, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth up the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cicero to Pyrrhus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, so is it to the dead of no use at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargain of buying this lasting discomfite, under stood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stohn out of the world without noyse, than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and cruelty: by giving in spoyle the innocent and labouring soul to the idle and insolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitantes, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germaner, which had neither greatness nor continuance) there hath been no State fearfull in the East, but that of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings far over his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moors out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, & by the many kingdoms which they possess in Europe, they are at this day the most powerful. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as have been spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defensive war, and in diversions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeeres, or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to live in peace, but all their swelling and overflowing streams may be brought back into their natural channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to root out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof; the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seek a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundless ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already said; That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwayes laid before them the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are always transported with the glory of the one, but they never minde the misery of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsel of Death, upon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth inuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is alwayes deferred. I have considered (saith Salomon) all the works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit: but who believes it till Death tels it us? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enjoyn his son Philip to restore Navarre, and King Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tels the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complaine, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beaurifull, and makes them see therein their deformity and rottenness; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast perswaded what none have dared, thou hast done, and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawn together all the far streched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet.

Lastly, whereas this Book, by the title it hath, calls it self, The first part of the General History of the World, implying a second and third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewn out; besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence, it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose unspeakable and never enough lamented loss hath taught me to say with Job, Vespa est in Lucum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

TO THE READER.

THe use of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annals, yearly set down all occurrences not coherent. This here following, may serve as an Index to the present part of this work, pointing unto the severall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far dis-joynted in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither do I think that any can be. For howsoever the yeers of the first Patriarchs may seem to have been well-neer compleat, yet in the reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we finde many fractions, and the last yeer, or yeers, of one King reckoned also as the foremost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other, though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the divers and imperfect forms of the year, which were in use among sundry Nations, causing the * Sommer * See lib. 2.
 moneths, in processe of some ages, to fall into the winter; and so breeding extreme confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to choos^{ap. 3. lib. 5.} out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing computations, as have already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alledged, in excuse of such error, as a more intentive and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serve to free the book, and likewise the Reader (if but of mean judgement) from any notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errors of the Presse, in the numbring of yeers, but for some hasty mis-reckonings of mine own, which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his own ease.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them, as will readily be conceived. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as [^{above} Macedonia] there do the numbers underneath proportionably answer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example, The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. yeer from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Jeholaphat began his reign in the 3774. of the Julian Æra, in the 3092. of the world, and in the 99. yeer of the Temple. This needs not more illustration, nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kinde. To avoid prolixity, I have forbore to insert those yeers, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident, as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings reign; some change of Government; some battell fought, or the like. So of the 13. yeers wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note onely the first, that is, omitting all between the 4. of Jeholaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Sylvius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Jehoram first reigned with Je-holaphat his father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a page with 12. lines of idle ci-phers, numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and the 17. of Jeholaphat. In setting down the Kings, whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth, in rank of those that reigned in his countrey, without notable interruption:
 Before the name is the first yeer of his reign; as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth, in rank of those that reigned in his countrey, without notable interruption:
 leave is the whole number of yeers in which he reigned, in the spaces following underneath, are those yeers of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeer of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to be understood, that the same yeer belonged not onely to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more of his foregoers: as the first yeer of Jehoram King of Israel, was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab.
 So where two or three names are found in one space, as in the 3077. yeer of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri, it is meant, that every one of them reigned in some part of the same yeer, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the reigns of the Egyptian Kings, are set down the yeers of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise other months, the day, the moneth, upon which Nabonassar's yeer began, which, how it varied from other yeers, may be found in the place last above cited.

To the Reader.

Concerning the Æra, or account of years, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the book itself: so it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads, is set down, first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reign in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first year thereof.

Now, for that the years of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one moneth, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painfull Chronologers have divided them proportionally in their severall Columns, opposing part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overboard with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I feared, as more troublefome than usefull, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needfull to observe, that howsoever the Aera of the Olympiads be 24. years elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar, yet the reign of some King may have begun at such a time of the year as did not suit with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficulty. One familiar example will explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reign the 17. of November, in the year of our Lord 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw down Images, and reformed many things in religion, all in her first year, yet not all in that year 1558. but the greater part in the year following, whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table, but so, as the difference is never of a whole year.

The Julian Period, which I have placed as the greater number, over the years of the World, was delivered by that honourable, and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian years, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980, years, which result from the multiplication of 19. 28. and 15. that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the years of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present year, or if no fraction remain, it shews the last year of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battell of Cannæ, the Prime or golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun, 18. and consequently the Dominical letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Period, after the present account, always exceeds the years of the world by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a year, than any other Æra (as From the beginning of the World, From the Flood,

From Troy taken, or the like which are of more uncertain position. And I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in works of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.
